No secret deals, Wakeham says

Labour call for enquiry over PowerGen bid

By PHILIP WEBSTER AND MARTIN WALLER

Labour demands last night for an independent commission of enquiry into recent privatisations after John Wakeham, the energy secretary, con-firmed that the Hanson combine might be paid a fee for its expenses in money, which sources close to bidding for PowerGen.

Gordon Brown, the shadow trade and industry secretary, urged that plans for further flotations be dropped until an enquiry had determined the scale of sweeteners and tax concessions involved in the sale of former public assets.

Mr Wakeham yesterday emphasised that no official offer had been made by Hanson for the smaller of the two state-owned electricity gen-erating companies. He said, in an interview on The World This Weekend, on BBC radio: There will be no sweeteners, there will be no secret deals, and at this moment there is no deal at all." His remarks

The programme, which involves planting "bamboo corridors" between the patches of bamboo forest that are home to the surviving pandas, thought to number fewer than 1,000, has been shelved by Peking since the political turmoil after the Tiananmen Square massacre of June last year. Mr de Haes hopes to visit China later this year to persuade the government to carry out the plan.

The panda's fate was raised by the publication yesterday of an internal WWF report criticising the effectiveness of many of the fund's conserva-tion projects in its first 25 years up to 1986, including the spending of £1 million on a panda breeding centre in the province of Szechuan, which John Phillipson, the retired Oxford zoologist who wrote the report, suggests may have been wasted because the centre is virtually unused.

Baker's enemies out hunting for a scandal

Baker: his departmental enemies smelt his blood

From Peter Stothard

MONGOLIA has taken up much Department of State time over the past few days, less because of the elections there than because James Baker, the Secretary of State, wanted an exotic hunting trip.

The Altai mountain haunts of the Mongolian argali sheep are a mecca for Texan hunters like Mr Baker. No Houston lodge can be considered com-plete without the argali's 6ft curling horns on its wall. So, when Mr Baker decided to make a 4,500-mile detour on his Asian tour to visit so obscure a country, his departmental enemies, who have for some time believed that he makes too little use of their taleuts, smelt blood - and they wanted to be sure it was Mr Baker's and not the argali's.

The Mongolian government had originally been happy to have the Baker party hunt its prize goat and was even prepared to waive the $25,000 (£13,600) killing fee which Texans normally have to pay. But some officials appear to have resented Mr Baker's "two-day hunting trip" at the taxpayer's expense and pointed out the bad publicity which might come from stalking so rare a beast.

They then made sure that the bad publicity came anyway, in the form of a front-page report in The Washington Post suggesting that hunting, not diplomacy, was the main motive of the first trip to Mongolia by a US Secretary of State. That left Mr Baker's spokesman to protest that her boss had no intention of taking goats from any endangered list and would be hunting only those which were "as common as deer in Alabama",

Hurriedly briefing reporters on a bus from Mr Baker's hotel to Jakarta airport

as he prepared to fly to Singapore, Margaret Tutwiler added: "He has never under any circumstances considered killing an argali sheep. That is a 100 per cent complete fabrication."

The visit to the Altai mountains was dropped days ago, she said. Mr and Mrs Baker would be travelling with their retinue to the southern Gobi desert at their own expense, she said, but if Mr Baker decided to hunt in Mongolia - no one denies that he flew to Asia with his rifle - it would be for ordinary goats.

Mr Baker, like President Bush, is a passionate hunter. Reporters who travel with him often tease him about his enthusiasm for killing game. On a trip to Africa he once told reporters how he had bought a licence to kill an elephant. When he had the beast in his sights, however he could not pull the trigger.

Motives of club gunman unclear

By QUENTIN COWDRY AND ARTHUR LEATHLEY

POLICE were still trying to discover last night why a gunman took over a London nightclub and threatened to kill more than 100 hostages.

During the ten-hour siege the man repeatedly threatened to blow up the club called Tokyo Joe, in Clarges Street, near Piccadilly, a venue popular with Arab businessmen. However, after intensive negotiations by police he gave himself up. None of the hostages was hurt.

The gunman, who spoke in Arabic and English, said that some of his relatives were being held hostage in the Lebanon. He demanded that police provide a bus and plane to take him and 59 of his Arab hostages to Beirut.

After bursting into the basement club in the early hours of yesterday morning, armed with a rifle, shotgun and bayoner, the man segregated the Arab customers, saying that he did not want to harm the Europeans present. Hos-tages spoke of him drinking during the siege.

Police, who ringed the club with marksmen, negotiated the release of about 40 hostages. Others slipped away during the night when the gunman's attention was distracted. Among those inside were a party of Arabs believed to include a member of the Kuwaiti royal family.

Det Supt Alec Edwards, the incident commander, said that police were perplexed as to the gunman's motives. He believed, however, that the incident had been carefully

Dissatisfied users urge reform of Post Office

THE 100 companies that are the biggest users of the postal service are seeking urgent reforms of the Post Office to halt a "rising tide of customer dissatisfaction".

The Mail Users' Association, founded in 1975 to represent the biggest users, has proposed that an independent postal authority be set up to allow this vital public service to escape the Treasury strait-jacket". The association claims that government-set financial targets have forced up the price of postal services.

The association wants the Post Office to be split into eight independent businesses. responsible for different aspects of the service, such as delivery, collection and

In a statement, the associ-ation said: "For well over a decade, the British Post Office has been profitable and its business has been growing rapidly. Normally, this would indicate a successful business with satisfied customers.

"But in reality the opposite is nearer the truth. There is a rising tide of customer dis-satisfaction with the quality of service provided by the monopoly-protected domestic letters business."

The association says that financial targets imposed by the Treasury are behind the 2p price rise for first-class and second-class stamps due on September 17. Proposed increases in international postal charges at the same time are unjustifiable, it says.

The authority suggested by the association would be a regulatory body for the eight new companies and would agree price levels and supervise standards. It wants its proposed structural changes to be implemented within 12 months to create a "new playing field on which the customer is king".

The association has also proposed halving the September price rises to Ip and introducing a customer compensation scheme for service failure. A Post Office spokesman said that the association was speaking on behalf of a relatively small proportion of busipess customers with special but important needs. The Royal Mail had an obligation to deliver to everyone. It was essential to keep a cohesive

The spokesman added: The MUA has come up with a pot-pourri of proposals with Alice in Wonderland time-scales. What they are propos-ing would involve massively disruptive re-organisation on a wholly unrealistic timescale, and this would seriously jeopardise service to customers, just at the moment when quality of service is showing a strong upward swing."

The report comes less than a month after the Post Office Users' National Council reported a record number of complaints against the Post Office last year.

British chess pair to play each other

By RAYMOND KEENE

THE only two British representatives in the candidates tournament to qualify for the 1993 world championship chess match are pitted against each other in the first round of the knockout competition.

The matching of Nigel Short and Jon Speelman in the draw announced by the World Chess Federation is a remarkable echo of the previous series in 1988. On that occasion the pair were also in the lists, were initially paired against foreign grandmasters but were suddenly switched by the authorities so that they had to play each other.

This time, it seems barely credible when Britain is the only nation in the competition apart from the Soviet Union to have more than one representative at this advanced stage, that the two competriots should be obliged to face each other at such an early stage. One is bound to be eliminated. Last time, it was Short. British chess fans will be deeply disappointed that the World Chess Federation has repeated

THE World Wide Fund for Nature (WWF) released a hitherto secret internal report yesterday which questions the effectiveness of many of the international conservation projects pursued by the fund over its first 25 years from 1961 to 1986. In particular, the report suggests that £1 million spent in China to help save the giant panda, the WWF symbol, has been a waste of money.

Charles de Haes, director of WWF International, said at a press conference in London yesterday that the criticisms had been incorporated in a new management strategy. However, in an announce-ment that will dismay many conservationists, he said that he agreed with the Duke of Edinburgh, the international president of WWF, who was quoted yesterday as saying that the chances of the panda surviving are not good.

The report, by John Phillipson, a retired Oxford zoologist, was commissioned by WWF to help redefine its aims for the 1990s, and was asked for warts and all. However, Mr de Haes gave details of the panda project criticised in the report: a breeding station and research centre in Woolong in the province of Szechuan. The Chinese had insisted on it when WWF involvement with panda conservation began in 1981, Mr de Haes said, although a number of senior fund officials, including himself, had had doubts about its usefulness. Dr Phillipson found the centre to be unused and

The threat to the panda, Mr de Haes said, was not from the failure of the centre, but from the failure of the Chinese government to implement the conservation management plan for pandas that WWF had helped them draw up, which would link the isolated patches of bamboo forest where the 1,000 or so remaining pandas live by planting bamboo "corridors". The plan seemed to have been shelved since the political turmoil following the massacre in Peking last year, he said; if it was not carried out, the panda faced a dismal future.

New archbishop praised by colleagues as man not afraid to speak his mind

Archbishop of Canterbury, are coming to terms with the outspokenness of Dr George Carey, Bishop of Bath and Wells.

While some churchmen at the grassroots expressed doubts at his volubility so soon after he was designated to succeed Dr Robert Runcie, fellow bishops praised his ability to "speak his mind".

One bishop was slightly concerned that Dr Carey is being courted as though he were already resident at Lambeth Palace, six months before Dr Runcie steps down.

Dr Carey told BBC Radio 4's Sunday programme: "I hope I will not be seen as a tough leader. I want to unify our church and lead it into the decade of evangalism."

'Sex ring' children placed in safe house

PETER TRIEVNOR

By KERRY GILL

SCOTTISH social work department has taken the unprecedented step of removing three children from their parents and placing them in a safe house after the children made allegations of being involved in a satanic sex ring. It is the first case of alleged child abuse with sacrificial overtones that has come to the notice of Strathclyde region's social workers. The region is further investigating reports that group sexual intercourse took place between adults and a number of other children. David Laing, the social work convener, confirmed yesterday that the children were in a safe house. The use of such a house is previously unknown in the region, the biggest in Scotland. Other children have been taken into care as a result of the claims.

Mr Laing said that the three children, all under the age of 16, had made the allegations to social workers. The case is being investigated by the department, under its director. Professor Fred Edwards, and Strathelyde police.

"I can say that we are investigating allegations of rit-ual abuse and there is a suspicion of satanic practices. Our procedure is to act first in the interests of the safety of the children pending an investigation," Mr Laing said. He added that the children were removed from their parents during the past few weeks.

Mr Laing said that the department had broad powers under the Social Work (Scotland) Act enabling it to remove children from their family home if they were believed to be under serious threat from abuse.

There has been a marked increase in child abuse cases in Strathelyde over the past ten years, although the authorities emphasise that this is largely due to increased publicity and the willingness for people to come forward with evidence. There were 290 children being treated for sexual abuse at the end of last year compared with 32 in 1981.

Last year the region dealt with 5,836 cases of alleged abuse against children, of which 1,530 were of a sexual

The photographs, based on the last known picture taken of the missing children, are altered to show what the child should now look like. The technique has enabled police to show how seven-year-olds might look in their early teens and could be valuable in determining whether some of the boys reported missing over the past seven years have started new lives or been victims of a paedophile ring now being investigated.

Fears over 176mph saloon car

AN EXECUTIVE car said to be capable of 176mph has been criticised by police and safety organisations.

The Vauxhall Carlton Lotus, to be launched at the Birmingham Motorshow in September, is expected to cost £40,000 and would be the fastest saloon car in Britain.

Peter Joslin, chairman of the Association of Chief Police Officers and Chief Constable of Warwickshire, said he could not understand the thinking behind the production of such a car. "In France they are talking about limiting the performance of cars to 100mph in the interests of road safety and that would be

"My great worry is if these sort of cars are stolen and fall into the hands of inexperiproblem of young people taking high-performance cars has already been identified."

The Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents said it feared the car could become a hazard. "We would question the responsibility of making cars capable of very high performance because speed is a factor in many fatal accidents every year.

The car would be so fast that a motorist driving at 60mph on a motorway could look in his mirror to see the Carlton Lotus half a mile away, pull out and have the vehicle on his bumper in 15 seconds. Paul Tosch, chairman of Vauxhall, has said the car reached 176mph in testing.

Last night Vauxhall said that engineers might be instructed to slow the car before it goes on sale. "We are reviewing the situation," the company said. "We are aware of the criticism we are likely to suffer if it is brought to the market with the sort of performance which has been speculated about."

Tokyo Joe's was set up by Michael Withers, a retired banker, who sold it in October 1982 to its present owners, Hrad Darian and his partner, for an undisclosed sum. The club is used by members of the Saudi, Jordanian and Kuwaiti royal families and a recent visitor was Edwin Starr, the pop singer.

successes of the tactics police have evolved over the years to deal with hostage taking. From the accounts given by the hostages, the handful of trained negotiators used the classic ploy of playing for time on the gunman's main demands, while granting, at strategic intervals, minor requests such as for food. Negotiations were conducted initially by megaphone. The gunman, sitting near the bar with four women in front of him, shouted his demands to an officer about 20 yards away just out of sight at the bottom of the fire escape. Later discussions took place by

Tackling armed sieges is now almost routine for the Metropolitan Police, though it has been many years since it has had to cope with such a serious one. In spite of the regularity of the threat, the force has no hostage-tackling unit. It relies on a team of senior officers, drawn from both uniformed and CID ranks, to lead negotiations when needed. Ombudsman to take up complaints about solicitors' services

LEGAL AFFAIRS CORRESPONDENT

THE legal profession's machinery for handling com-plaints from the public is expected to receive close scrutiny with the appointment this week of the first legal services ombudsman for England and

The post is being set up by the Lord Chancellor under his legal reforms bill in response to what he sees as "public disquier about the effective-ness of the profession's procedures for dealing swiftly and effectively with alleged failures in professional competence". The appointment of the ombudsman, who will have oversight of the solicitors' and barristers' complaints machinery, comes at a time of increasing complaints about lawyers from the public and concern about how such complaints are dealt with by the Law Society and the Bar.

Earlier this month, Lionel Lightman, the lay observer, said that his own complaints machinery was "on the verge of breakdown". His office acts as a last resort for clients who are sull dissatisfied after going through the Solicitors' Complaints Bureau.

Because of the increase in complaints to the lay observer's office three extra staff were drafted in to help him. At

There is still dissatisfaction with the bureau's workings. Recently it faced the threat of judicial review proceedings over its handling of a complaint against a London solicitor, Arnold Rosen. He was reported to the society in 1988 by a client after changing his mind about his legal costs.

That complaint in turn led Mr Rosen to take up the way the bureau investigates such matters. After being on the receiving end, he is critical of way complaints are looked at. He maintains that decisions are taken in secret by the bureau's adjudication committee, which decides if a penalty should be imposed. without a right for the solicitor to be heard, on the basis that this process is "peer review" and if it was public, the committee could not get through its work. The real right of audience before the committee is that then each would have to be represented and "that would be an administrative inconvenience", Mr Rosen says.

"But in the 2,000 cases a year where the committee are minded to discipline, why should not a solicitor exercise a right to be heard?," he asks. His judicial review proceedings did not come to trial. The Law Society reached an agreement in which it agreed to withdraw its criticism and pay his costs, about £75,000.

He later revised the figure to complainant and solicitor a bureau no longer enjoys the confidence of the public or of the profession. He has only once been reported to the bureau and describes himself as "simply an ordinary member of the legal profession" looking in from the outside. He believes, however, that the bureau is wasting its time "on matters that have absolutely nothing to do with professional misconduct", such as a the loss of a client's file or refusal to accept payment by

Recently Mr Lawson had experience of the bureau as a customer after reporting two other solicitors. The handling of both matters, he says, was unsatisfactory. One case took the bureau 17 months to decide to act on his complaint and in that time four different people dealt with one matter.

There are also complaints by the lay observer himself, whose job will be abolished when the legal services ombudsman takes over on January 2. He has pointed out a case which took six years to get to court, and where the bureau decided disciplinary sanctions were not warranted He says it was a "matter of some concern that the bureau should apparently find, on the solicitors' own account, unexplained delays totalling over three years to be acceptable."

The Law Society is drafting new professional practice rules which will require solicitors to tell clients of their charging rates at the start of a transaction and to inform them of the internal procedures the firm has for handling complaints.

If endorsed by the society's council, the new rules are expected to bring a big decrease in complaints now going to the bureau. Instead, these would be handled by solicitors themselves. Mavis Fairhurst, for the bureau, said: "People are hung up on the word complaint. But if only the profession would realise that every enquiry only becomes a complaint when it is not dealt with effectively then it would reduce much of the bureau's The bureau is planning a reorganisation of its services. Under its new director, Veronica Lowe, it aims to put more emphasis on customer care and diagnosus services and less on the bureau's punitive role. The result should be greater emphasis on ensuring that justifiably aggrieved clients are properly and swiftly compensated, with only cases deserving penalties against solicitors going through that machinery.

Miss Fairhurst said: "Everything that comes in at present is treated as a complaint when, in fact, 27 per cent of the 18,000 matters are capable of being dealt with through conciliation and can be sorted out on the ground." The plan is for all letters to be channelled through a "diagnostic unit" which will then hive off all matters which are not complaints or which can be handled through

Second, under the legal reforms now going through parliament the bureau will have power to award £1,000 in minor negligence cases. Third, there are plans to extend the conciliation schemes, now running on a pilot basis. Under these, the case is sent back to a local conciliator who acts as a mediator between complainant and solicitor. Here, the list included failure to invest in education and training, allowing the economy to become less competitive and fall behind the rest of Europe, a feeling that the Tories have lost touch with the needs of ordinary people and the belief that it is time for change.

According to party stratexists the most welcome finding of the analysis was public party and a belief that Labour, rather than the Conservatives. was committed to providing economic opportunities for stood the needs of families.

The analysis found that neither party had a decisive lateral disarmament, renat- lead on taxation. According to shadow cabinet as it prepared ionalisation and extremism. party strategists, however, it suggested that keeping down taxes was well down the list of voter priorities. High on the list were abolishing the poll tax, improving the health service and schools, fighting pollution and keeping down the cost of living. Opinion polls yesterday presented differing pictures to the political parties. A Mori poll in The Sunday Times said that Labour's lead had been cut to 8 per cent, a reduction of two-thirds since March. In contrast, an ICM poll in The Sunday Correspondent put the Labour lead at 16 per cent, only one point down on the previous month. The Mori poll suggested an increase in support for the Conservatives from skilled manual workers and said that more than one third of the so-called C2s are supporting the Tories, compared with a quarter in April.

Teacher training disrupting school life, heads claim room on training courses, with an average of about 15,000 of the 400,000 teachers in Eng-land and Wales away from school every day of term, according to a survey carried out by the National Assoc-iation of Head Teachers.

David Hart, the associ-ation's general secretary, said yesterday: "The substantial increase in the level of training during the school day bodes no good for the standard of education provided for the pupils in the schools." He believes teachers should be paid to undertake training in their own time with the cost met from money saved by not employing supply teachers. The education and science department, however, insisted last night that the training was essential to equip teachers for the national curriculum and that it was up to local authorities to ensure that this was of disruption to pupils.

Mr Hart said that the 1989-90 figures showed that in addition to the five training days allowed every year, when schools are closed to pupils, teachers spent 2,891,772 days training, a 9 per cent increase on the previous year, with every teacher spending an average 7.3 days out of the classroom.

He is particularly concerned about the differences between the local authorities. Cleveland has an average of 1.9 days per teacher compared with Nottinghamshire, at 16.3, and North Yorkshire with 15.3. Among the 18 of the 40 county councils above the national average, Avon, Bedfordshire, Devon, Gloucestershire, Hereford and Worcester, Northamptonshire and Oxfordshire all exceed double figures

Four of the 20 outer London boroughs are above the national average, led by Barking, 19.3, and Enfield, 12.2, with Sumon the least at 1.2. The metropolitan boroughs are headed by Bury with 31.7 and Bradford, 17.8, while St Hel-ens is at the foot with 2.9.

Mr Hart said: "The enormous variation between one local education authority and another deserves the closest possible attention." He is to ask John MacGregor, the education secretary, to investigate the disruptive effect training has on children's education and the need for supply

The education department said that training was vital for the teachers' professional de-velopment and for the education of their pupils. "It is part of the teachers' normal duties and good planning of teacher training should minimise interference with pupils' educ-ation. We do not dispute the

The number of pupils misspelling words rose in almost every case between 1984 and 1989. For example, those who cannot spell "committee" jumped from 57 per cent to 75 per cent. Those who mis-spelt "merely" rose from 26 per cent to 39 per cent.

How poaching adds up to a crime wave on the river bank day and allows a skilful bailiff to

RONALD Rose's attempt to become a legitimate salmon fisherman on the Dee foundered last week.

Neston Crown Court, in Cheshire, revoked his commercial fishing licence for a minimum of two years after hearing that between the time of National Rivers Authority bailiffs catching him poaching the river and the court convicting him, Rose, aged 59, of Lache, Chester, had been granted a licence to do legally what he had been caught doing illegally. He was also fined £75 with £100 costs and his boat and fishing gear were confiscated. His poaching parttory from the main contenders | ner. Alan Ingram, aged 43, also of by arguing that with three Lache, Chester, was ordered to do

120 hours' community service and to pay £100 costs

The two had denied poaching salmon on the Dee early one morning last August. They elected for trial by jury before the crown court, which can impose unlimited fines for illegal fishing. Rose's assertions that he had merely stopped by the river to relieve himself, that two large salmon found on the bank were not his and that one of the bailiffs was trying to "set him up", were not accepted. The men had been observed by five bailiffs who were camouflaged and in hiding along both banks of the Dee and watching proceedings through an image-intensifying monocular, a device that turns night into infiltrate his way among poschers, when the night is not too light. The bailiff's job is made even more difficult by the laws enmeshing the catching of fish. It would have been in order for Rose and Ingram to druft down the Dee in the early morning with their armoured net stretched across the waterway if they were catching fluke, flatfish that are a popular target and poachers' alibi. The fact that fluke are best caught at high water be-tween September and December and that this was low water in August might have caused the bailiff's brow to pucker. But when, through the monocular, the hailiffs saw the men lift salmon from the net and put them under a sod of grass on the bank, the offence under the Freshwater Fisheries Act had been established. Salmon caught accidentally in pursuit of other species must be returned immediately to the river.

The law has been strengthened by section 32 of the Salmon Act, which makes it an offence to bring salmon ashore even when the person in possession may not have caught the fish. This disposes of the whiskered excuse of "We found them on the bank and were on our way with them to the fisheries officer" by which many a poacher has escaped. On the 26 miles of the Dee estuary the rise in poaching has, like other crime, grown with unemployment in the region. Although salmon farming has cut the value of wild salmon and complicated the law for the bailiff, unable to tell "wild" from "farmed", a good 10 lb wild fish will still fetch £25 on the backdoor market and the authorities have failed to have hoteliers included in the licensed dealer net.

> legal salmon catch on the Dee is 1,000 by rods and 1,500 by nets, but estimates that the total may be almost doubled by poachers, with the problem also afflicting all the other salmon estuaries. Brian Hodgson, area fisheries officer, said: You have a multi-million pound illegal market, and loss to the industry, to tourism, the environment and the health of the rivers."

The first freely elected parliament since the war has so far failed to find a new president, government is para-lysed, and MPs are divided over whether to allow a live broadcast of testimony by the former communist leader be-

Parliament, which meets today, seems unlikely to resolve the deadlock and a source close to the opposition said that the leader of the Union of Democratic Forces, Zhelu Zhelev, is expected to demand the resignation of the Socialist government. This move is bound to heighten tensions, especially since the lack of a president makes the government's resignation almost a technical impossibility. The Socialists, the renamed Communist party, kept power in elections held in June.

Food even money cannot buy

The advantages of Moscow over other cities in the Soviet Union suddenly become obvious when you leave the place for a few days. That is largely because, if you have somewhere to live and foreign currency, you can usually eat.

This is not true of the Soviet Union's second city, Leningrad, where eating for anyone who is not in an organised group and does not have Leningrad identity papers is a daily quest for survival. Leningrad, long before Moscow, decreed that its food shops should sell only to registered natives. Hotels find individual guests an inconvenient distraction from the main business of groups.

power. Even if you do not have to brandish a packet of Western cigarettes to attract his attention in the first place, your waiter will bring your bill and a bald statement at the end of the meal, that a few dollars will do nicely and "let's forget the bill". The other advantage of Moscow, again as long as you have foreign currency and somewhere to live, is that sometimes you can telephone abroad.

If you cannot fulfil the first condition, however, you have a problem.

The government newspaper, Investia, runs an occasional series where the reporter is given a "mission impossible". One which proved surprisingly easy a year or so ago was to buy carnations in a Siberian city in mid-winter. More recently, a journalist was dispatched to buy a flat in a town supposedly pioneering flat sales. He came within a promise of his fittings. But the company has no control over lines.

The Japanese, as so often, have the right idea: bypass the system altogether. They are marketing mobile phones in Moscow. So far the number of lines is strictly limited and cells can be made only from the Moscow area. But conversations are clear and the apparatus is a good deal cheaper than a new Soviet phone line.

That convertible currency will hat convertible currency will and won't buy has become the topic of frenzied conversation in Moscow. For weeks a debate has raged about the merits of extending the limited range and number of special foreigners' shops and opening them to the Soviet population.

Increasingly, Soviet citizens have been allowed to use the existing range of shops if they can prove their foreign currency has been obtained legally. This condition is largely fictitions since a suitable amount of money foreign, of course - produces the necessary guarantee.

The idea that the network of hard currency shops would be extended and opened to people with convertible currency, however they came by it, repelled many. For years, having foreign currency was tantamount to proof of criminal activity.

People with a social conscience.

objected that sought-after goods, which a Soviet citizen might, theoretically, find by chance or earn by long hours of queuing would henceforward be restricted to those with foreign currency. Several economists arguedthat the move would accelerate the "dollarisation" of the Soviet economy and sap confidence in the rouble still

The Soviet government says it has considered all those arguments, appro-ciates their force, but has decided none the less to open the new shops. The state's need for hard currency, it says, overrides everything else. In time, it may also mean that hungry foreigners prowling the streets of Leningrad may find something to eat.

MOSCOW NOTEBOOK by Mary Dejevsky Russians had ten years ago been redistributed to those who paid their bills in foreign currency. He had also learnt that if you do not have a trunk line or need another one, the Soviet State Telephone and Telegraph will charge you 13,000 convertible roubles (£13,000) for the privilege. The coup attempt by Muslim militants in Trinidad

Robinson is paying price of ignoring city's poor

Caribbean football championships to think about. The government of Arthur Robinson, the prime minister, is unpopular, but not that un-popular. The Jamaat al-Muslimeen was feuding with the government, but that was not new.

Was not this the land of Caribbean oil dollars, the world's most peaceful car-nival, the land of cricket, calypso and steel bands, a land which has held free elections regularly every five years since self-rule in 1956?

The man who turned that image upside down at the weekend, Yasin Abu-Bakr, is a former policeman and footballer who studied mass communications in America. About one in eighteen people in Trinidad and Tobago is Muslim, part of the long Indian migration into the southern Caribbean after emancipation. But Mr Abu-Bakr is of African descent with all the zeal of the Islamic fundamentalists and of the Black Muslim movement in the United States.

He has run the Jamaat al-Muslimeen on a compound eight successive years; living just outside Port of Spain for standards have fallen by more

TRINIDAD and Tobago had centre, and runs medical clinjust escaped a tropical storm called Arthur on Friday night and was in no mood for more upsets. Then there were the promising attacks on poverty and deprivation.

The imam cut little ice with the Trinidadian middle class which, since Mr Robinson came to power in 1986, has found a government more sympathetic to its interests. He clashed with successive governments over the legality of his commune and its buildings. There were police raids, buildings were torn down, and for three months an army unit has been stationed at the compound angering Mr Abu-Bakr, who claimed it had no legal justification. He offered to work with the government to alleviate poverty and to supply a cargo of scarce medical supplies, but was rejected. The middle class remembered only that the Jamaat al-Muslimeen was well armed. that some of its members had been in trouble with police, and that it enjoyed support from Libya, which several of its members have visited.

Trinidad and Tobago's long recession during the 1980s provided fertile ground for Mr Abu-Bakr's concerns. The economy has contracted for many years. It includes a than 40 per cent since the oil mosque, school and day-care boom ended, and unemployment has risen to 25 per cent. Mr Robinson and his National Alliance for Reconstruction came to power with a buge majority at the end of 1986 promising to reverse the decline. A series of austerity measures backed by the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank have slowed but not stopped the decline. Serious social tensions arose, including friction between the two main ethnic groups, and scores of businesses collapsed.

Mr Robinson's government

argued that little could be money from an out-of-court about the imam's coup atdone to solve social problems settlement would be spent on without money, and the top a monument to an outspoken priority was to restore positive growth. This left him open to accusations of being insen-sitive to poor people's problems and too preoccupied with macro-economics.

His recent enthusiasm for a 20-year-old corruption scandal, in which the Tesoro Petroleum Corporation is said to have bribed members of former governments, and his announcement that part of the and will be deeply uneasy

Trinidad and Tobago has strong democratic instincts

tempt. But in one sense it is restaging an old class battle which last erupted in an army mutiny and black power up-heaval in 1970, and which has produced sporadic upheavals in the powerful labour movement since then.

Mr Robinson, in his concern to restructure the economy, has taken working-class patience too much for granted and is paying the price.

The White House said in a statement: "The United States fully supports the elected government and is consulting closely with it and other interested governments in the region. Mr Abu-Bakr had complained of harassment by the Trinidadian authorities, and had hinted several months ago that he was planning a coup. He understood Mr Abu-Bakr had contacts in Libya, but these did not include Colonel Gaddafi. He said it might make the Trinidadian government pay more atten-tion to Muslim leaders. Arthur Robinson, the Trinidad prime minister who was being held hostage, had been due to attend a a summit of the Caribbean Economic Community (Caricom), of which Trinidad is the second largest member. In Kingston, Percival Patterson, acting prime minister, said that Jamaica's defence force was being made ready in case the community was asked for military assistance.

Small numbers of Caricom troops were involved in the US invasion of Grenada in 1983, which followed the murder of Maurice Bishop, the prime minister.

Eugenia Charles, prime minister of Dominica, who requested the 1983 invasion, said of the Trinidadian attempted coup: "We cannot allow this nonsense." THE three-and-a-half-yeardadian prime minister Arthur Napoleon Raymond Robin-son has been plagued with controversy over his aloof and autocratic leadership.

His multi-racial political co-alition, the National Alliance Reconstruction, soared to power in December 1986. It rode in on a wave of optimism that more open government could put an end to the corruption of the Afro-domi-nated People's National Movement (PNM) which had ruled for 30 years, and could save the nation from sharp economic decline.

Within months Mr Robinson was at loggerheads with the leading Indian members of his cabinet, whom he even-tually sacked after their criticism became outspoken.

With national consensus for his economic austerity programme shattered, the 63year-old prime minister's standing has been steadily eroded under a barrage of attacks about high-handed leadership and muddled

With elections looming again, the soft-spoken native of the tranquil twin island of Tobago recently launched an anti-corruption campaign aimed at undermining the resurgent political hopes of the PNM.

SPEAKING at a rally to general and a member of the relaunch the South African ANC executive, should be communist Party (SACP) yes-excluded from next week's the ANC's desire that the Communist party, "like all other political formations in our country" should be active participants in the negotiation

At yesterday's mass rally, munists' first in South Africa for 40 years, the party pledged its commitment to a peaceful negotiated settle-ment. Mr Slovo denounced the government's claims that the party was plotting armed insurrection as an attempt to break the alliance of the party and the ANC. For the first time the Communist party named its in-ternal leadership, although real control will continue to be in Lusaka, the Zambian cap-ital. Among those identified was Ronnie Kasrils, intelligence chief of Umkonto we Sizwe, the ANC's armed wing, who appeared at the rally despite being wanted by the Last week in Johannesburg Mr Kasrils told journalists that he and Sathyaudranath "Mac" Maharaj had worked together to build up an ANC underground movement as insurance against the failure of constitutional talks. Mr Maharaj, also a member of the ANC executive and named as a member of the SACP internal leadership, is being held under security laws.

Yesterday, in his reference to the government's allegations of a planned insurrection by communist and ANC members, Mr Mandela said that "to suggest that these outstanding sons and daughters of our people harbour ideas of unilateral military action against the peace process is an insult".

Mr Slovo, in his speech, declared: "We, too, believe that a negotiated solution is in the interests of all South Africans, white and black. We have said over and over again that our party is committed ity of this kind of uprising both to the letter and spirit of the Groote Schuur Muni (the commitment to peaceful negotiation agreed by the government and the ANC at the Cape Town talks in May)."

Shortly before yesterday's rally, the authorities released extracts from computer mes-sages which, it is claimed, outline plans for the alleged insurrection.

Reports here yesterday said some of the documents the police seized had been sent to the ANC offices in London and dealt with guerrilla training there. It was suggested that, if Mrs Thatcher were convinced that the documents were genuine and regarded the allegations as serious, the dinary cadres of the SACP and ANC could be forced to close not a policy-making body.

Iraq for talks with neighbouring Kuwait appear to have derailed plans for an early meeting between the two sides to settle a crisis over oil and territory.

Diplomats in the Gulf said that Iraq emerged strength-ened from an Opec meeting in Geneva last week that forced other Gulf states to accept oil production discipline as de-manded by Baghdad.

Iraq said yesterday that the talks with Kuwait, due to have started at the weekend in the Saudi port of Jedda, may not be held this week, and added that Kuwait might be to blame for the delay. King Husain of Jordan flew

IN A scene that could have come from gangster film, four mourners dropped the flowers they were holding at a New York funeral on Saturday and sprayed the crowd with machine gun fire, wounding seven people.

The cemetery shooting in suburban Linden, New Jersey, capped a week in which violence in New York appeared to have entered a new phase. Three children were shot dead in separate incidents, hit by stray bullets from gunfights, and police reported that dealers in "crack" cocaine had taken to staging old-fashioned duels at

About 100 people were at the funeral of Vinh Vu, the leader of a Chinatown gang called "Born to Kill", when the gunmen approached, apparentiy to pay their last respects. "As they walked by the casket with a bouquet of flowers, they dropped them and opened fire," said Captain Raymond Beckman of the local police. The men used a shotgun and three Uzi automatics. Police said it was surprising that only seven were wounded.

Mr Vu was murdered in Manhattan early on Wednesday. Detectives said his "crew" was feuding with a Little Italy gang.

Meanwhile Mayor David Dinkins and other officials attended the funeral of Veronica Corales, aged nine, who was shot in the head in her parents' car in Brooklyn.

Two other children and two adults were also killed by stray bullets in the last four days from the wild gunfire that has become routine in parts of Brooklyn, the Bronx and Manhattan.

In the small Brooklyn district of East New York, 22 people were killed in the first three months of this year. Major Owens, the local congressman called on the governor, Mario Chomo, last week to send the National Guard to restore order. Localnewspapers have exhausted the vocabulary of war to describe con-ditions inside the big Brooklyn and Bronx housing estates.

Israeli police arrest eight as beach bomb kills teenager

FTOIL OUR CORRESPONDENT IN JERUSALEM

EIGHT Palestinians were detained by the Israeli police yesterday after a home-made pipe bomb exploded on a crowded Tel Aviv beach, kill-ing a 17-year-old Canadian girl and wounding 18 other sunbathers.

The victim of Saturday's attack was Marnie Kimmelman, of Willowdale, near Toronto, who was with a Jewish tour group. She died after surgery for stomach wounds at Ichilov hospital, Tel Aviv. The 18 injured, including three from Miss Kimmelman's youth party, were released after treatment, but hospitals detained an Arab who was hit over the head in one of several attacks by revenge-seeking Israelis.

Saturday's home-made bomb was hidden in a beach bag placed between two chairs near a lifeguard station. One of the suspects was seen fleeing at the time. The bomb was the latest in a series that have exploded in Israel since May 20, the day an Israeli man opened lire on Arab workers, killing seven of them. Arab militants vowed to avenge the lead in the opinion polls underlines the fact that the politicians have left Westminster with the prospects for the general election wide open. Minor embarrassments of one sort or another have followed the government to the brink of the recess and the all-important constraint of inflation still overhangs Mrs Thatcher's future.

Thwarting the Labour guns

Yet Labour is still not fully trusted and faces in Mrs Thatcher the most remarkable combination of conviction with political flexibility since the war. Her ability to temper her principles with whatever shifts of position she thinks necessary to maintain her hold on power is quite exceptional. This is not ignoble power grabbing for its own sake. It reflects rather a missionary spirit which persuades her that she is the best person to do what has to be done whatever it happens to be. She has something of the same spirit of being called to the job, adopting whatever improvisations are necessary, as animated Simon de Montfort and Oliver Cromwell. What she is persuaded is right to be done is right to be done.

None of this diminishes her attachment to the basic market principles for which she took over the Tory leadership. Temperamentally she needs to work from firm rules and to have around her those who reinforce them with evidence and dogma. But she is not in thrall to them. The distancing of 10 Downing Street over the weekend from the anathemas pronounced by Sir Alan Walters against the European exchange rate mechanism illustrates the

Mrs Thatcher has now genu-inely let herself be persuaded by the weight of her cabinet col-leagues opinion that Britain must join, and although the government still waits for the time to be right", that is no longer a simple escape clause. Sir Alan is therefore simply being awkward in continuing to recite his creed. Mrs Thatcher's attitude is reminiscent of an episode shortly after she first gained power when she advised a questioner on a particular topic to talk to a certain industrialist who was then much in favour. A couple of years later, when the opinion of that industrialist was put to her, she was dismissive, remarking simply: "He only sings one tune."

Contrary to appearances, singing one tune is not her own practice. She can change key, improvise and add counterpoint to a degree which subordinates the main theme if that is necessary. That is good Tory practice. Alistair Home's biography of Harold Macmillan describes how that prime minister's father-in-law, the old Whiggish Duke of Devonshire, grumbled on the grouse-moor. "These damned grouse, they won't fly straight -like a lot of Tories!" But there is no merit for a political party in lining up neatly for the benefit of the enemy's guns, and Mrs Thatcher is Tory enough not to do

The shrinking of Labour's it Conservatives know that there are no final answers in politics, only temporary solutions which bring new problems. It is this pragmatism, with Mrs Thatcher adding her gift of willpower to the cabinet consensus on responding to current challenges, that constitutes Mr Kinnock's biggest

His own party is of a very different sort. Its roots had always been nourished by an ideology which has been systematically demolished over the past three or four years. Almost the entire output of information from Labour has been designed to reassure the voting public about what it would not do. It would not renationalise (or at least, not so as to be noticed), would not restore the trade unions' power over workers, would not leave the European Community (but would be more European than the Tories), would not impose controls over capital or industry and would not unilaterally renounce the nuclear deterrent.

Perhaps most important it electoral terms, it would not add to the taxes of the majority. Or would it? In reality, it hardly seems credible for Labour to out-bid the Tories on the public services - which is its main point of attraction - without either putting up taxes in some form or another for those who are not, by any objective test, rich (those earning just plus or minus £20,000), or by causing inflationary pressures. If anything, the inflationary constraints troubling Mrs Thatcher will pose even greater difficulties for Labour, and much ambiguity still hangs over its intentions to make life better by higher public spending.
Of all Labour's potential

commitments, only one seems quite clear: the return to the rates in place of the poil tax. But although the poil tax was misbegotten and remains unpopular, the rates in their day were unpopular too. Who, therefore, is to say whether Labour will gain or lose more on balance by this commitment, which will probably help mostly those who are already committed to the party, while alienating many floaters who find that under the poll tax they are marginally better off?

Above all, there still exists in the town halls and on Labour benches active representatives of the old Labour party who resent the dismantling of socialism, whether in their own party or in Eastern Europe. The Tories have no equivalent of the enemy within to disturb their image, though they do have a risk of splitting on principle over Europe.

Mrs Thatcher therefore still holds the initiative. Though Labour has decided what it must do, it is still unsure about what it dare do. The Tories will not fly straightto make targets for Labour's guns (their troubles have made them anything but suicidal) and Mrs Thatcher and her new cabinet consensus still have the potential for a fourth victory.

Michael Dynes, transport correspondent, suggests a compromise in the rail freight dispute

ith the Channel tunnel due to link the British and continental road and rail networks three years from now, the spectre of a big increase in heavy lorry traffic on our already congested motorways is worrying a growing number of politicians, industrialists and local

They fear that the development of Europe's trans-continental rail freight distribution system will stop at Folkestone, where, because of government reluctance to sanction sufficient public investment in new railway infrastructure, freight brought into Britain by rail will be switched to road. According to these critics,

Britain will then become paralysed by traffic jams, scorned by its continental counterparts and deserted by those businesses able to relocate on the continent, until it is finally marginalised on the fringe of Europe.

Although such warnings may be tinged with a little hyperbole, there will certainly be a big increase in cross-Channel freight. The European Community now accounts for about 60 per cent by value of all Britain's imports and exports, more than 90 per cent of which is moved to and from the ports by road. The single market will lead to a further increase in EC trade which could put an intolerable strain on Britain's motorways.

To provide through freight services to and from continental destinations, British Rail plans to invest £310 million in electric locomotives and freight wagons and to upgrade existing lines. With this investment, BR hopes to capture 6.7 per cent of the market, doing away with 400,000 lorry journeys per year.

The problem is that Britain's loading gauge, which governs the height and width of the loads that trains can take through tunnels, under bridges and past lineside structures, is considerably smaller than on the continent. So continents of the continent of t nental freight will have to be transported in smaller units if it is to run on British lines. One partial solution is to put smaller wheels on the wagons, enabling BR to use continental-sized freight wagons. Although presenting other technical problems - excessive track friction, weight restrictions and dangers from braking at speed this would be better than doing nothing at all, but does not address the problem of greater wagon width. So even if smaller wheels were adopted, BR could still lose freight traffic to the roads.

Privately, BR officials admit they are prisoners of history, and victims of the government's stringent investment requirements.
Railway lines in Kent — where loading gauge difficulties are particularly acute — were built on the cheap, and because BR always expected to remain isolated from continental railways, there seemed little point in changing them. Exasperated by what is widely seen as the government's failure to take advantage of the Channel tunnel by equipping Britain with a high-speed passenger line between Folkestone and London, together with new freight lines built on a gauge that accommodates continental traffic, John Prescott, Labour's transport spokesman, last week outlined a £5 billion rail scheme, designed to spread the benefits of the tunnel throughout The proposals were immediately denounced by Cecil Parkinson, the transport secretary, as being "hugely expensive and hugely uneconomic". Admittedly, the proposals were short on detail. No revenue forecasts were provided, and the absence of a cost breaksuspect the project could just as £25 billion as £5 billion.

However, Mr Prescott's proposals did strike a chord among industry and commerce, whose spokesmen are increasingly con-cerned that the absence of longterm transport planning will place Britain, especially outside the south-east, at a serious disadvantage to its continental competitors. In the words of one transport analyst: "BR does not set policy, the government does, and doesn't. Between Mr Parkinson's rigid adherence to free-market principles and Mr Prescott's demand for billions of pounds of investment in railway infrastructure, there lies a third possibility, hitherto overlooked by the participants in the road-rail debate. According to BR's own calculations, the cost of converting to French gauge the existing lines between Folkestone and London, and the east and west coast main lines to Edinburgh and Glasgow, is £600 million.

But this cost would be too large for BR to justify commercially. Even if it were allowed to breach the 8 per cent return on investment demanded by the Treasury, investment costs would still have:

forcing rail freight prices up, thus pushing freight back on to the roads again. Conversion could occur only if it were funded by the taxpayer, and this is prohibited by section 42 of the Channel Tunnel

Making such a project work would require a radical change in government attitudes towards the railways. BR has to provide a service that will be sufficiently cheap and reliable to persuade manufacturers to use freight trains rather than drive on-drive off shuttle trains. That means making key lines compatible with continental gauges. The prize for BR could be the total loads of one million lorry journeys to and from the tunnel a year, against its present modest target of 400,000.

The project would have to be paid for by government, possibly sels. But that is appropriate, for the public interest is involved. It would provide a more cost-effective and environmentally sensitive way of reducing motorway congestion and promoting regional access to the continental rail network than either the in-

Not just a few rotten apples, enough to taint the system

Adding the echo of a 1952 murder trial to his armoury, Bernard Levin points an accusing finger at Britain's much-vaunted police and judiciary

remember the Craig-Bentley case for a number of reasons, but one is dominant: I do not exaggerate when I say that it significantly helped to shape my life and work. At the time of the events, which was late 1952, I was just starting my career as a journalist, but so little footing did I have that I was not at all certain that I had found my metier, or even, if I had, whether I wanted to

The seed which the case planted for me might have borne fruit in one of many professions, and of course there is no need to make such a connection at all; many people, following the case, must have had an identical reaction, without any continuing effect. But from that day forth, I have never allowed myself to believe in the myth - perpetuated in and by our egal process — of the unstained unstainable Olympian judge, raised high above the courtroom to seek justice and promulgate it. In the Craig-Bentley case, so shameless was the bias of the judge (Lord Chief Justice Goddard), not only in his summing-up but in his entire handling of the proceedings, that my image of the Bench was transformed.

Silly people, lawyers mostly, say that I hate the Bar and the Bench I have looked at both with a profound scepticism, and whenever I feel the scepticism wavering. I recall the sickening eulogy which Denning pronounced from the bench, obiter, at the time of Goddard's death in 1971, and the scepticism bleeds afresh. (The scepticism needed no encouragement when Lord Donaldson raised that delightful cloud of implausible pomposities to avoid being questioned by the May committee on the Maguire case.) I had now better explain what all this is about. Christopher Craig, though only 16. was a hardened villain: Derek Bentley, who was 19 and borderline mentally defective, was very much under Craig's thumb. They went to rob a warehouse; someone saw them and called the police. Bentley gave himself up at once, and from then on was in custody. Craig drew a revolver, and a gunbattle with the police ensued; one of the officers was shot dead.

Although Bentley was under arrest throughout, and had no gun, he was charged with murder along with Craig, largely because it was said that he shouted "Let him have it" to Craig, thus encouraging Craig to kill. There was a counter-argument for the meaning of the words; instead of the slang use of the term, it could be held that Bentley was urging Craig to surrender the weapon. In any case, Bentley denied saying the words at all. Both were convicted.

in force; Craig was below the age at which criminals could be executed, but Bentley was a year over it, and was sentenced to death. It was widely assumed that the sentence would be commuted; even Goddard recommended clemency. But the home secretary was the dreadful Maxwell Fyfe. and Bentley was hanged.

Many books have been written about the case; there was even a play, by Ludovic Kennedy. (I was whanging Ludo over the head the other day, on the subject of euthanasia, but my admiration for his work in righting judicial wrongs is unqualified.) Gradually, as more and more has come to light, it has begun to seem that Bentley's hanging was a gross miscarriage of justice. There is now more evidence that Bentley did not say the vital but ambiguous words; more important, it is claimed that the bullet which killed PC Miles could not have fitted Craig's gun, but could have been fired from a police revolver, thus turning murder into a tragic and terrible accident.

wrong for a reason. Though Bentley is beyond any more pain, his sister, supported by the forensic critics, has now presented the case to the Home Office, seeking, with fresh evidence, posthumous rehabilitation for the hanged man.

My regular readers will know that I hold the belief that there is no act so outrageous, no cover-up so shameful, no concealment of the truth so indefensible, that the Home Office would shrink from it. If you think that that is coming it a bit strong, read a few of the books about the Timothy Evans case. (Ludo wrote one of those, too: the home secretary, when it became clear that John Christie had committed the murders for which Evans had been hanged, was Maxwell Fyfe, who presided over a cover-up.) There were people in the Home Office at that time who should have faced prosecution, for the crime of perverting the course of justice.

So I do not hold out great hopes for the Bentley family and their pitiful quest. I cannot, of course, comment on the Randle-Pottle case, because it is still going on, but I can remind you that earlier in the proceedings, when the defence needed a document which the Home Office was trying to keep hidden, David Waddington, the home secretary, had to be ordered by the judge to produce it. That sort of conduct is what the Bentleys are up against; it would not surprise me in the least if the Home Office has had evidence of the hanged youth's innoceace, "wrong" builet and all, since the hanging, or indeed before it.

But why am I wandering about in the past, when the present is rife and stinking? I rook no part in the campaigns to free the Guildford Four and Magnire Seven, and if I joined in now for the Birmingham Six I could be accused, with justice, as being a johnny-come-lately. But I can see a barn door by daylight, and it is clear to me that what lies at the heart of our judicial and criminal system, which has been exposed in these terrible cases and many lesser but similar ones, is nothing to do any more with the traditional, "bandful of rotten apples in the barrel", putrefaction. Too many coppers are bent; too many expert witnesses are incompetent; too many judges, starting with Lane and Donald-son, seem implacably, blind and dear to their own weaknesses. And now comes news which will make the cynics, who have been saving these things for many years, laugh themselves into stitch-ups.

Mr Kevin Taylor has recently iblished a book. The Poisone Tree, which accuses virtually the entire Manchester police force of an exceptionally wide variety of corrupt practices; he alleges that they deliberately set out to ruin him as their contribution to what has come to be called the "Statker. affair". So grave are his charges that it was impossible for the police to ignore them; but they rave now done the next best thing. Instead of calling in investigating officers from another force, as is the custom, they have handed over the smoking bomb to the Police Complaints Authority. This well-meaning but ridiculous body can be guaranteed to take five years over its investigation, and then say that after so great a passage of time it cannot come to any useful conclusion. whereupon everybody can go back to sleep. But I shall toss and turn. and any sleep I get will be haumed with bad dreams. I said when I began that I have had a lifelong scepticism about our processes of law. So I have; but scepticism is not the same as disgust and anger, which is what I feel now. Corruptio optimi pessima.

Kinnock's yen to get up and go

pecause the headlines were B dominated by the Ridley affair and the release of Daphne Parish from an Iraqi jail, Neil Kinnock was denied the publicity mileage he hoped for during his recent trip to Washington. Now, as the suspicion spreads abroad that Mrs Thatcher might not be eternally invincible after all, he is looking for another field to conquer. But where?

Russia is the obvious place for a high-profile visit in which Kinnock could spread his international-statesman wings before the world's television cameras. But that is just not on. President Gorbachev's problems are piling up on so many fronts he would barely have time to shake Kinnock by the hand and ask after his good friend at Number Ten. Looking further east, though, is one country which Kinnock aides consider ideal for his purpose and where discreet hints are already being dropped: Japan. Kinnock is keen to meet the prime minister, Toshiki Kaifu, and business leaders to discuss Japanese investment in Britain. Japanese firms already employ 9,000 people in Wales, 500 of them in his own Islwyn constituency. To come back with even a hint that another few billion yen might soon be on the way would give a boost to Labour's still substantial but declining lead over the Tories.

The omens for a visit are good. The Japanese press, influenced by the way President Bush received him as a potential prime minister, is taking a closer interest in ore drama in the usually quiet world of chess. If Britain produced two potential Wimbledon champions - unlikely it is true, but just suppose - and they were drawn against each other in the first round not once but two years in succession, there would be a row of McEnroe-style proportions. But that is what has happened in the world chess finals, in which Britain has two representatives, grandmasters Nigel Short and Jon Speelman. The last time they at least got beyond the preliminary round before the World Chess Federation brought them face to face. "This time it's even worse, it's the last 14, as opposed to the last eight," says Speelman, who won the last showdown before losing to Jan Timman of Holland.

The tournament pairings are determined by the federation on current world ratings, but Speelman believes another system should be adopted to keep national representatives apart. Raymond Keene, the Times chess correspondent, says: "It's ludicrous. If this were any other sport there would be a national outery. Now that Keene has delivered his dossier on the suspected missing murder victim, he might perhaps lean on the British Chess Federation as a first step to an international campaign.

• The news that the government is to cut British armed forces in Germany by 50 per cent will come as no surprise to the Adam Smith Institute, which recommended such cuts in September 1983. Young's move was the biggest surprise of the reshuffle, and was seen by some MPs as an olive branch to Tory poll-tax rebels. But Young has also been noted for his strong attacks on the government's failure to uprate child benefit in line with inflation.

Many Tory backbenchers are now reacquainting themselves with Young's speeches to see how they can improve their own promotion prospects. They include Michael Brown, renowned for his mischievious sense of humour, who sought out Young the other day to congratulate him - adding: "I am so convinced by your arguments on child benefit that next time we fail to uprate it F shall naturally vote against the government." Young's reaction. alas, is unknown.

TRINIDAD'S TRIAL BY FIRE

The seizure of the prime minister and other members of the government of Trinidad and Tobago by a violent fringe group of black Muslim radicals underlines the chronic vulnerability of very small states to extremist movements. Small communities are easily ignited by strange sparks.

Nothing suggests that Yasin Abu Bakr, their sinister leader, has a following which extends much beyond the 250 members of his commune on the outskirts of the capital, Port of Spain. Most of the Caribbean's 400,000 Muslims are of Indian origin, and have nothing in common with Caribbean black Muslim politics, inspired by the American Black Power movement of the 1960s. Most black Trinidadians are Christian. Abu Bakr's known admiration for President Gaddafi excites general contempt. Yet the assault was followed by extensive looting and arson.

Suggestions that the external world should rush to assist almost invariably accompany such crises, and have already emanated from Eugenia Charles, the Dominican prime minister, one of the architects of the American intervention in Grenada in 1983. Such "help' would be inappropriate. The calm response of the Trinidadian military, political and re-ligious establishments to the militants' blackmail is a tribute to the maturity of the country's democratic institutions.

The country's leaders have, however, been badly shaken by the anti-government slogans chanted by the rioters, and the speed with which civil disorder broke out. The unpopularity of the government led by Arthur Robinson, only 30 months after winning a landslide victory with the promise of rescuing the country's tottering economy, is such that the rebels' demand for his resignation and for elections within 90 days will be so widely supported as possibly to be irresistible. Much of his unpopularity is the result of economic policies which no responsible government would change. Trinidad and Tobago is paying dear for the economic overheating (and overborrowing) which accompanied its oil boom in the 1970s and early 1980s. After six successive years of recession, the austerity plan launched by Mr Robinson is only just beginning to arrest the downward spiral.

The reforms, which include extensive privatisation and reduced subsidies to lossmaking state enterprises, together with cuts in the civil service, are indispensable. But they have been accompanied by real hardship; family incomes, once the highest in the Caribbean, have halved since 1980 and unemployment is nudging 30 per cent.

These woes would have been more readily borne had the government kept another important part of its bargain with the electorate: the promise to eliminate Trinidad's endemic corruption in public life. Nor has Mr Robinson, who heads a multiracial coalition. given its East Indian members sufficient weight - a failing exacerbated by the sacking of his East Indian foreign minister.

Should the hostages do a deal? No government could lightly contemplate honouring an agreement extracted at gunpoint by ruthless and violent fanatics, who have known links with Libya and who have not the remotest claim on the loyalties of Trinidadians. A bargain reached in such appalling circumstances is no bargain at all. But fences with the broader electorate will require some scrupulous mending.

Pierre Mendès-France once said that "democracy is much more than the holding of elections and government by the majority. It is a form of manners, scruples and civic sense, of respect for opponents." One legacy of Britain's empire has been a multitude of small states. Life will never be easy for them and the Commonwealth has been right to encourage regional economic cooperation. Military intervention is a different matter, and would be an undeserved humiliation for a country which has stood up well under this weekend's severe trauma. The world should leave it sympathetically alone to resolve the social and ethnic divisions which pose a deeper threat to its democracy than have Abu Bakr's murderous followers.

THE SWEET TASTE OF POWER

Not since Guinness bid for Distillers has a potential purchaser been paid a fee for making its offer, yet the energy secretary, John Wakeham, yesterday indicated that the government may be prepared to pay such a fee to Hanson PLC, the conglomerate that wishes to take over PowerGen. The suggestion is that if Hanson should make an offer for PowerGen, thus short-circuiting the planned offer for sale of PowerGen shares to the public, Hanson might be paid an "underwriting fee" in return for leaving its bid on the table while alternative offers are examined.

Any such payment would compound the damage inflicted by the Rover affair to public iaith in the interrity of rovernment deals with the private sector. Although underwriting fees are part and parcel of share flotations, they are usually paid to merchant banks and others for agreeing to buy any shares which are not sold in the public flotation. The underwriters are there as a safety net, to make sure the government gets its money. The mooted Hanson deal is something quite different. There is nothing particularly unusual in the owners of a company which is subject to an offer deciding to test the market thoroughly by seeking offers from elsewhere. But the company making the original offer is not rewarded for starting the ball rolling, and if it loses out to a higher bidder, that is merely an aspect of the free market system.

Hanson is expecting to make good profits from a purchase of PowerGen, and has already been richly rewarded for its initiative in opening the door to a bid by having access to a great deal of confidential information about the company. Other companies are now expressing interest in bidding, but Hanson has a head and shoulders start on any competitor, and presumably likes what it sees sufficiently to wish to carry on to the next stage.

Hanson must be wishing that it had not leaked the fee idea into the public domain, for the fuss being kicked up over a small principal (but an important principle) will mean that any deal the company strikes, no matter how above board, will be regarded with suspicion. For that reason alone, the government ought never to have contemplated any such payment. In addition, the fee is a commercial irrelevance. Whether or not Hanson eventually bids a price which is acceptable to the government will not be dictated by a sweetener of the kind being talked about. Hanson will bid if, and only if the deal is commercially advantageous.

The fuss about the fee should not obscure the more important debate as to whether PowerGen should be sold to any single buyer, a dedate which is also dikely to be clouded by fears of an asset strip. The main purpose of PowerGen, after all, is to provide two-fifths of this country's non-nuclear power, and there is a strong, legitimate public interest in seeing that it goes into hands which will provide the appropriate level of financial, managerial and technical support.

The government's options are far from wide open. It would be quite wrong to sell Power-Gen to an owner which would cut back on investment merely to maximise short term profits. Long term vision is required. It would be equally wrong to allow ownership of Power-Gen to be used merely as a route to other commercial objectives. That would appear to exclude purchase by big suppliers of equipment. Competition in energy supply must be ensured, a goal which would rule out National Power, British Gas and the French state-owned electricity company EDF. By the time all the "vertical" and "horizontal" would-be bidders for PowerGen have been excluded, the companies that remain with the finance and credentials are few and far between. Hanson, given a head start as the government's preferred bidder, should be paid no so-called underwriting fees for accepting such a privileged position.

BLACK, WHITE AND RED-FACED

After the leak of a damning report on its activities, the spotlight which has focused recently on a number of international charities has now swung to the World Wide Fund for Nature. Yesterday the Fund - known chiefly for its efforts to save the giant panda responded with a promise to change its spots, in a mea culpa at times frank and refreshingly self-critical. But what a shame that it took a newspaper leak and an imminent television documentary exposé to force WWF's hand.

Usually outsiders' reports on charities are insisted upon by big funders: government departments or trusts, perhaps. But this one, conducted by John Phillipson, a former reader in zoology at Oxford, was commissioned by WWF itself. The idea, a sound one, was to assess the charity's first 25 years of operation, and to learn from the results. Much has been made of the finding that 27 per cent of the selected projects studied by Dr Phillipson and his team did not have successful outcomes. That nearly three-quarters of the fieldwork was successful might not be such a bad tally for a conservation organisation working primarily in Third World countries appears to be an unaffordable luxury." And birth: "The less precise the aims and objectives of a project are, and the more costly it is, the registered trade mark, is a picture of the cuddly creature. To WWF's immense embarrassment, the report shows that the vast sums of money poured into China to protect the beast have had little effect. WWF spent nearly £1 million on a breeding and research centre in which only one live panda has been born (and has since died). According to Dr Phillipson, "WWF has not been effective or efficient in safeguarding its massive investment." Now the organisation admits that the animal may still become extinct, despite its efforts.

What is puzzling about the whole episode is not so much WWF's poor management many charities share that trait - but its naiveté about what to do with the report. It printed only a few copies, and kept them locked up in headquarters. Predictably, the news leaked out, and WWF is now seen to be guilty not just of bad management of its conservation activities. but of its public relations too.

Should it have commissioned the report at all? There was always a chance that the findings would be critical, landing the charity in the dilemma expressed succinctly in a leaked memo from the Duke of Edinburgh, WWFs president: "Whatever we do with it, we are bound to get into trouble. If we don't publish it in full, we are bound to be accused of trying to 'cover up' something. If we do let it out, all the mischief-makers will have a field day."

Few powerholders like to be held to account. and those who opt for such accountability without outside pressure should be praised. It was brave of WWF to have brought in Dr Phillipson in the first place. Having commissioned the study, the charity should have made the criticisms public immediately along with the steps it planned to take as a result. It might then have been praised for its candour. Instead, it has suffered for its cowardice. All charities should take the lesson to heart.

From the Principal of the University of Strathclyde

Sir, It was evident from the "Wealth of Nations" Conference in Edinburgh (reports June 28, 30) that among the many issues that confront the world, the most important by far is over-population. Mankind's threat to itself, and not least to all the other and not least to all the other species, is already severe. Since we can with some certainty predict from existing and probable birth rates the growth of the human population, it is further evident to most thinking people that the earth's capacity to sustain an acceptable way of life or even life itself is soon to be in question. itself is soon to be in question.

Most of our energy, environ-mental and economic problems and many of our political and social problems are populationdriven. Regrettably, the danger from the consequential macro-scopic threats of excess carbon dioxide, oceanic pollution and Third World poverty are too distant in time and space to stimulate an appropriate human

Whilst, therefore, their indirect effects will eventually and inescapably be felt by us all, in the meantime the human mind will be diverted by lesser things. Tinker-ing with car exhausts is an mple of the trivialisation of the major catastrophe in front of us.

The resistance to population control will be strong. It will stem from religious principles and in that context it is vital to bring into the open the microscopic issue of the right to bear children.

I wish to challenge that right, firstly because of the general consequences of population overshoot. Secondly, at the level of the individual, especially the individ-ual child, it is clear to many that the rise of notified child murders,

He also says that it should not be overlooked that it July 18) might I endeavour to nip in the bud the common mistranswas our shooting and hunting ancestors who planted the woods lation of juge d'instruction? The juge d'instruction bears little or no resemblance to

we enjoy now.

During the last 200 years numerous woods have indeed been planted in the interests of hunting and shooting, and especially in the 19th century, but many of our richest and most interesting native broadleaved woodlands were not planted, but are semi-natural remnants of original wildwood.

These remnants have naturally regenerated themselves after each felling during century after cen-tury of careful management, and have gradually evolved a complexity of native flora and fauna which no amount of planted woodland can replace or imitate until hundreds - and sometimes thousands - of years have elapsed.

In Suffolk - from which Mr Bingham writes — there are some 3,000 hectares of these ancient semi-natural woodlands remaining to be enjoyed today, but they were not planted by shooters, by hunters, or by anyone at all. They are greatly to be treasured. Yours faithfully

Teachers' pay From Mr Lawrence Norcross

Sir, Is it not inconsistent of the larger teachers' unions, who have opposed all previous attempts by the government to break the local authority monopoly of state education, now to condemn John MacGregor's proposals for local pay bargaining (report, July 21)? If, as the unions appear to believe, these authorities are best placed to administer the education service, they are surely also in the best position to determine appropriate rates of pay.

Of perhaps more pressing and immediate concern to individual teachers is that they are likely to be the principal beneficiaries of any competitive tendering for their services. This would be so particularly during a period of teacher shortage (which both the unions whose gesture politics seldom serve well the practical interests of their members — and the Opposition assure us is presently the situation). Some of us would like to see the process carried one stage further, with responsibility for levels of pay devolved to the individual school, as it is in the independent sector, but in the meantime Mr MacGregor's proposal is a step in the right direction.

Case for direct population control Survival of the Welsh language as well as of violence and abuse, is such that the rights of the yet to be conceived child to be spared From Mr Cellan Williams Sir. It will take more than legislation to ensure that the Welsh language, used as an everyday means of oral or written communication, survives the next century (leading article July 21; report July 23). It will not be saved in schools but among ordinary people, and it is here that it has lost most ground.

Do supermarkets function in Welsh? ls it possible to play cricket (or even rugby football) in Welsh? Can business and industry function in Welsh? To its credit, Welsh provides admirably for poetry, music, literature and the arts but its grammar is not easily mastered. Not many people will make the effort when they know that even those who claim to be able to speak Welsh also speak English fluentiv. The Weish-medium schools are a brave effort to turn the tide but even here, in both the primary and secondary sectors, much has to be done in English if pupils are to be properly prepared for life in the United Kingdom and elsewhere. Yr eiddoch yn ffyddlon, CELLAN WILLIAMS. 5 The Glebe, London Road, Wheatley, Oxford. Jшу 23.

From Mr Terry Green Sir, The Wales CBI has recently warned the Welsh Office that its proposed Welsh language act may be economically damaging. In pursuit of the Welsh Language Board's objectives, schools, already desperately short of cash, are having to divert resources to fund the compulsory teaching of Welsh to all children between the ages of 5 and 16.

Sir, Contrary to what Nirad Chaudhuri contends (article, July 21), there seems no evidence that a majority of British people want political union with Europe, as opposed to the common market

Because it could split each major party, this momentous issue is being played down. Popular demand has not raised it, one suspects, because political union is so incredible to the general voter that the danger of "federalism by stealth" (Tim Congdon, article, July 13), and being steam-rollered in (Mrs E. Moreton, letter, July 17), is gravely under-estimated. The Prime Minister, rightly seen as a brave defender of the Europe des patries most voters might favour, faces a contrary view among other members of the sion to any federal union. Were the referendum to favour such union it would nevertheless be wise, in view of the evident fragility of multi-national structures, to establish the conditions and due process for possible

Welsh can only harm the cause of promoting the Welsh language. Judging from the orientation of TV aerials on house roofs the people of Gwent in particular have more affinity and contact with the people of Bristol than those of the rest of Wales. would be better advised to concentrate their energies on maintaining a nucleus of Welsh speaking rather than hasten the demise of the language by seeking to force it on the uninterested. Yours faithfully, GREEN,

From Mrs Rosalind Byrne Sir, Your report on Welsh school policy raises two points of general interest. The first will surely interest immigrants everywhere; that English immigrants in Weish-speaking parts of Wales appar-ently prefer that their children should not have the opportunity of being taught in the language of their adopted country.

Secondly, the council spokesman is quoted as saying the policy "has been concentrated upon children between the ages of four and seven because our experience has shown that these are the ages when children can best assimilate new languages". Exactly. To the best of my knowledge, this simple fact is known in every European country—except one. The Department of Education still makes no provision for language-teaching before the age of 11 in state schools. Why?

European integration From Dr Howard Erskine-Hill,

they favoured in Harold Wilson's referendum,

For Britain to join a federation without a democratic decision could create centuries of frustrated nationalism and resentment. The UK should therefore hold a further referendum, prior to acces-

Should the referendum decide against, Britain ought if possible to maintain a marginal relation with the EC (much decried currently, but most appropriate to a country cherishing its links with the wider world). Failing that, the UK should pull out completely. Better be poor but our own masters on a modest scale, than engulfed in what many, with some reason, regard as a Napoleonic nightmare.

Yours faithfully, HOWARD ERSKINE-HILL Pembroke College,

From Viscount Watkinson, CH Sir. What kind of Europe we will leave for our grandchildren mat-ters a great deal more than the daily round of political intrigue and power play. So when we face the choice, for the new greater Europe, between the "quick fix" of monetary union and political integration or the more complex long-term solution of a united Europe based on sovereign states, we should all think long and hard about what is best in the end for each individual citizen. The British Government's view that a solution on the lines of aunion of nation states will be the best for all the inhabitants of the new Europe may not be universally popular, but as we showed once before, to stand alone does not mean that you are on the

This is very unsatisfactory. After an investigation lasting nearly a year the bureau has recently ruled that I got an acceptable service from a solicitor who would not respond to letters and phone calls, would not keep me informed of progress on the sale of my bome to the extent that the bureau had to be called in to make him contact me. Ancient hooligans

From Mr J. R. Milner Sir. Previous correspondence on this topic (July 12, 18, 24, 27) has stressed the belligerence associated with football. It is interesting to reflect, however, that there have been occasions on which the game was considered wasteful of time which could be more advantageously spent in the development of truly war-like skills - such as archery.

An Act of 1447, in the reign of James II of Scotland, illustrates this point. This Act was concerned with Weaponshawing, the equiva-lent of the English Wapentake, at which designated areas were each required to furnish an assembly of armed men as proof of readiness for war. It decreed that:

Wapenshaws be held by the Lords and Barons spiritual and temporal four times each year, and that-football and golf be unerly cried down and disused, and that the bowmarks be made at each Parish Kirk, a pair of butts, and that shooting be made each Sunday, and that each man shoot six shots at the least under the pain to be raised upon them that come not at the least ij d (2d) to be given to them that come to the bowmark to drink . . . and as touching football and golf we ordain it to be punished by the haron's fine.

OBITUARIES

DR BRUNO KREISKY

Dr Bruno Kreisky, Federal Chancellor of Austria from 1970 to 1983, died yesterday in Vienna aged 79. He was born on January 22, 1911.

BRUNO Kreisky was the man who put Austria back on the world map after the devastation of two lost world wars and a 10-year period of fourpower occupation. Under his leadership beginning in April 1970, his forceful and often controversial style led to an increase of Austria's prestige abroad (with the notable exception of Israel) and helped crystallise the image of the new Austria which emerged after the demise of the Habsburg empire and the ill-fated alliance with Hitler's Germany. Kreisky's style was a highly personal one. The country

nicknamed him "The Sun

King" - referring to France's Louis XIV - and he often behaved more like a monarch than like a democratic leader, although he deeply respected democratic principles. He found it difficult to tolerate strong personalities around him, either in his own government or in opposition, and was sensitive to criticism. He regarded the country's rejection, against his advice, of nuclear energy in 1978 as a personal defeat and left no stone unturned to get the decision reversed. But he was the benevolent leader whom the Austrian people badly needed, a man of authority and a respected international statesman. His foreign policy lifted Austria out of the doldrums of self-pity, and put it on the map as a country practising, to use Kreisky's words, "active neutrality", playing a key role between East and West, and indeed between North and South as upper-class Jewish family, he did not seem destined for politics. From the start, however, he was an active member to waltz, he was at Socialist youth movement meetings. When the party was declared illegal in 1934 he joined the underground, and was arrested the following year and sentenced to 16 months' imprisonment for "high trea-

cellor in a minority Socialist government for the first time March 1970. In October 1971 he turned to the country and was re-elected with a majority. This majority was confirmed and increased in 1975 and 1979. Under Kreisky Austria enjoyed a period of prosperity, riding out a succession of economic world crises with relatively little harm. Inflation remained low, as did unemployment, although the price was an increasing national debt. The Austrian schilling became one the country's stability became had a Nazi background. Kreisky's actively-pursued Middle East policy made him the first western leader to receive Yassir Arafat, the Palestine Liberation Organisation leader, in 1980 and he granted the movement de facto diplomatic recognition. This brought down upon him the wrath of both the Israeli cabinet and opposition, and of the small remaining Jewish community in Austria. With Willy Brandt, Kreisky played a significant role through the Socialist International in the evolution of western Europe's Social Democratic parties towards a more even-handed approach to the Palestinian

This kind of individual and often unpredictable activity was typical of Kreisky's foresight and of his courage in daring to go against the main-stream of opinion both at home and abroad. His journalist years left him with a sixth sense for publicity and, besides speaking at dictation speed, he made sure he remained in the limelight and on the front pages. He never let an opportunity pass in order to promote Austria's image abroad. Kreisky was one of the leading figures behind the 1977 Helsinki process to lower east-west tensions and his influence was also felt in Spain as the moderate Socialists readied themselves for office. Already in poor health, he resigned office in April 1983 after the Socialists failed to win an outright majority at general elections. Early m 1988 the former Chancellor publicly attacked President Waldheim of Austria in strong terms as the controversy raged over the latter's concealing his activities during the second

ELIZABETH ALLAN

Elizabeth Allan, the film and stage star and television personality of the 1950s, died aged 80 on July 27. She was born on April 9, 1910, though some sources give the year as

1908. ELIZABETH Allan's first real impact as a screen actress came in 1932 in Alexander Korda's first British film, Service For Ladies, in which she co-starred with Leslie Howard as a rich woman who mistakenly thinks that the hotel waiter who is courting her is a prince. In the same year, she played opposite Ivor Novello in the remake of The Lodger, and appeared with John Gielgud in his second sound film, Insult. In May 1933 she signed a contract with Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer and quickly became one of the most popular British stars in Hollywood, among the first serious British actress indeed in the 1930s to achieve this status there. She appeared in 1934 with Clark Gable in Men In White, with Robert Montgomery in The Mystery of Mr X and with Constance Bennett in Outcast Lady. In 1935, she was directed by George Cukor in David Copperfield, playing young. David's mother, and, in 1936, played opposite Ronald Colman in A Tale of Two Cities, lustrous, but for her decision to sue M.G.M for losing the promised lead in The Citadel to Rosalind Russell Louis B. Mayer, head of the studio, is said to have blacklisted her, and in 1938 she returned to the London stage in her greatest West End success, Quiet Wedding, which re-united her with Frank Lawton. She returned to British films and in 1940 proved herself an accomplished comedienne in Saloon Bar, with Gordon Harker and Alec Clunes. In 1942, she was radiant in Technicolor as the spirited actress and singer, Mrs Cibber, in The Great Mi Handel, and in 1944 was George Formby's leading lady in He Snoops To Conquer. In 1946 she was seen at the Aldwych Theatre in And No Birds Sing and in 1947 was teamed again with her favourite co star, Frank Lawton, in The Animal Kingdom, at the Piayhouse.

After an absence of five years, she reappeared on screen with Myraa Loy in That Dangerous Age in 1949, joined Martene Dietrich and James Stewart in the film of Neville Singe's No Highway and was seen as Katharine in 1951, and gave the best of Hepburn's sister in A Woman her later cinema performances.

JULY 30

THE French ignored this mer-etricious British argument on the wisdom of a venture into Egypt. In an endeavour to cut off Britain from India, Napoleon occupied Egypt in when the Turks joined with the British in forcing him out.

On the PROJECT of

against EGYPT.

Russia had concerted a plan for invading the European part of Turkey, and to drive the Grand Seignior

beyond the Bosphorus, several memoirs were presented to the Privy Council of Louis XV, tending to prove the utility, necessity, and counterbalance the power which the Courts of Vienna and Petersburgh were going to acquire in the Levant.

Egypt, said these memoirs, possesses the most fruitful soil on earth, of easy cultivation, and of certain produce.

In point of extent, it is equal to two-thirds of France; and from its richness, the revenue to be drawn from Egypt may twice, nay three times exceed that of France. It unites all the productions of Europe and Asia, yielding curn, rice, cotton, flax, indigo, etc; and the possession of that country would fully compensate for the loss of all other colonies ... It is badly defended, and easily subdued and preserved. By means of Egypt, France would be connected with India and engrose the whole trade in the Red Sea. The ancient circulation of commerce by Suez would be restored; the Cape of Good Hope would be deserted; all the riches of the interior of Africa would be brought to Egypt by the Abyssinian caravans; gold dust, elephants teeth, gums and slaves. The last would cost at Cairo no more than 150 livres

Tournois a head, while 800 livres are now paid upon an average for a slave on the coast of Guinea. By encourag-arise from the climate.

ing the pilgrimage to Mecca, France would enjoy the whole trade of Barbary as far as Senegal. Thus, that colony, or rather France herself would become the entrepôt of Europe, nay of the Universe. It is this vast plan, in the execution of which the Directory is now engaged; but the success is obstructed by difficulties which we shall now briefly

It is pretty generally supposed.

that the Directory acts in concert with the Grand Seignior, and that the latter has sent some Greeks to Egypt with sirmans, ordering every thing to be prepared for the reception of the French. The partizans of this opinion, however, do not recollect that the dominion of the Grand

Seignior over Egypt is merely nom-inal. Besides, the Mahometan re-ligion does not allow the Sultan to deliver up to infidals either the

The Republicans will, therefore, have to subdue the Turks resident in Egypt, and meet with a resistance on the part of the natives, apparently less formidable, but in fact far more dangerous. The armed force of the Marolucks, it is true, does not exceed

10,000 men; but if Franks, that is to say, the enemies of God and the Prophet, dared to land in Egypt, Turks, Arabs, Peasants, would all join to oppose them. Fanaticism would supply the want of skill and courage ; for fanaticism still prevails in Egypt in all its native fervor, and so much abomination, that the greatest insult which can be offered to an enemy is to call him a Frank.

Franks are not allowed to travel on the mules or jack-asses. Europeans, therefore, can make no settlement in Egypt, without having previously excurpated the natives of the country

... Supposing for argument's sake, that the Mamlucks were exterminated, and the people subdued, the conqueror of Egypt would have to govern men, whose language, manners and customs he is unacquainted with ... The French soldiers will scandalize the natives with their drunkenness, and enrage them by their insolent conduct towards the women ... Additional dangers will obody in their right mind would give vio-lins to a class of 35 sixyear-olds and expect but pandemonium. If only half the six-year-olds had English as a first language, the confusion would be compounded. The past ten years have proved that assumption wrong and 13 schools in one of the more disadvantaged parts of London provide the evidence. The violins came to Tower Hamlets when the String Teaching Project was conceived to make music experience available to every primary school child, not just an auditioned elite or an interested minority.

The project relies on weekly class teaching by a team of five specialist musicians. The team leader has three helpers. Group lessons are supported by back-up lessons given by one teacher to groups of about six children.

The youngest children prepare for string playing by joining in singing and movement games and simple percussion. At the age of six or seven, the children are presented with instruments and music-making begins in earnest.

The first lessons aim to establish freedom of movement and how to hold the instrument and bow. Open strings are used to play simple rhythms that the leader. Verbal explanations are few as helpers move around the class demonstrating by touch rather than word.

Learning depends on listening, so playing in the earliest stages is often by ear. Reading music is introduced using a central chart, focusing the children's attention on a single note.

The repertoire is attractive. Tunes such as "Cowboy Chorus" "Hoe Down" are great favourites. Several teachers have also developed their own material, which has been published.

Teaching musical instruments to groups rather than individuals is not new. The Suzuki method. for instance, relies on group teaching, but that, according to Robert Neden, Tower Hamlets' project manager, is where the similarity ends. "The Suzuki system is pretty middle-class," he says. "It is teacher-dependent and appeals to those who like a frame-to become independent, to use their brains as well as their fingers. "I can honestly say that I get a real thrill from hearing a 'caveman' quartet of absolute beginner string players struggling through a bit of ensemble music, knowing that they will learn as much from the Suzuki method and the Tower Hamiets approach is even more fundamental. Sheila Nelson, Europe's most celebrated string teacher and a consultant to the project, says: 'We begin with broad, sweeping movements, which we then refine. We work towards achieving a natural freedom of movement.

fter 18 months of deliberation and pencil markings, Stuart Luker is under pressure. The man whose decisions will affect the final A-level grades of 13,000 economic students, is being cross-examined.

At the Associated Examining Board in Guildford, Surrey, Mr. Luker has been presenting his final gradings for paper 2 economics (data response) to the board's awarding committee. As assistant chief examiner and creator of the paper, he appreciates the importance of his decisions, "We are dealing with 17 to 18 year-olds in examination conditions which are often hot and unpleasant," he says. "There will not be many perfect answers, and I have to adjust standards accordingly."

This summer, the board and its sister organisation for GCSE exams, the Southern Examining Group, have received two million scripts from more than a million candidates. By Friday this week, all papers should have been marked, checked eight times and filed, after a long procedure involving subject officers, "moderators," committees and examiners.

Mr Luker is present at the inception and conclusion of the process. In March last year, he started the formulation of his fifth economic data response paper. By drawing up a series of graphs and accompanying statistical information, he hoped to test students' grasp of economic principle once more. The marked papers lie before the awarding committee, which assesses Luker's recommendations for each grade.

David Eales, one of three committee's members, says: "We are trying to work it out from years of experience. We have to ensure that the person who took last year's exam would achieve the same result in this year's."

The board and the Southern Examining Group have been criticised for the handling of result appeals. This month, it was revealed that an examiner had been dismissed after wrongly downgrading children from a school in Avon. George Turnbull, communications officer for the group and the board, admits that a formal school, but claims the marking procedures are virtually

Who examines the examiners, and why does marking take so long?

After the exams are sat in June, each examiner has three weeks to mark up to 350 scripts. Junior examiners will receive only 150. Once the grades are settled by Mr. Luker and his conferes, they are put on computer and sent to groups of schools and colleges.

Though private schools have acted to solve the problem, most state schools, which have nine million children in their charge, have not. If serious injuries occur to a child during school time, parents may face enormous financial burdens. Recent court cases have demonstrated that the insurance liability of schools is limited to accidents where it can be proved that teachers were negligent by, for instance, failing to provide adequate supervision or reasonable safeguards.

The rise in the number of school accidents was highlighted at a conference at Stoke Mandeville Hospital in Buckinghamshire, attended by educationists, parents' groups, safety and sporting organisations, and legal and insurance experts.

Douglas Stewart, a litigation lawyer and member of the Spinal Injuries Association, says: "In the past few years, it has become the norm for children at private schools to be automatically covered by insurance, but, unfortunately, the message is not getting through to state schools.

We have been pressing the government and local authorities to make parents aware of this. Parents appear to believe that once their children are in school, they are in a safe environment.

The facts show this is not so. "If parents knew how difficult it was to win a case against a school, particularly for sporting injuries, most would opt for the sort of cheap policy that would provide substantial compensation without the need to prove blame."

Dr John Silver, head of the spinal unit at Stoke Mandeville, became aware of the problem several years when there was an epidemic of rugby injuries. "Two of my own children were playing rugby," he says, "and the first thing to do was to get them insured."

Dr Silver's pioneering work in the field of sporting injuries has led to changes in the rules of rugby and to the introduction of insurance cover by the Rugby Union for all players, including children. Gina Borrer, of Brown Shipley.

the insurance broker which organised the Stoke Mandeville conference and which specialises in insurance policies for schools, said that though more than half a million state school children were covered, fewer than 90,000 in state schools had taken out such

A difficulty is that while private school managers can opt for policy as an organisation and add a small amount to school fees to pay for this, the burden falls to state schoolchildren's parents to make individual arrangements.

For a school of a minimum of 200 pupils, basic insurance cover would be £6 a head, which would give maximum benefit of up to £100,000. For little more than £2 a month, a parent can take out a policy on a child which would give 24-hour, year-round cover and maximum benefits of £200,000, for accidents at home, school or on holiday abroad.

The company's own survey of 1,000 claims arising from accident at school shows that sports injuries account for 40 per cent of the

The government and local authorities were criticised at the conference for not alerting parents. A Department of Education and Science official said it was a matter for each local education authority or parent. retary for education at the Association of County Councils, says the question of insurance crops up more and more. "One issue is whether the whole community should contribute to insurance cover for children. It would add another million or so to the budget at a time when finances are stretched. The best advice for parents is to get general insurance cover for their children.

he National Confederation for Parent-Teacher Associations (NCPTA) has long campaigned for the introduction of such schemes into schools. George Whiting, the NCPTA's insurance officer, says the schemes are neglected by local authorities and teachers.

Mr Whiting knows of only two authorities, Devon and Nottingham, where the education authority has made a point of spelling out the dangers for parents and recommending insurance policies or the NCPTA for more information.

"Several companies are trying to break into the schools market with cheap schemes, but when you examine them, they stipulate restrictions. For example, certain sports are excluded, or there is not 24-hour cover, or the schemes do not cover children for holidays abroad. You have to read the small print carefully.

"One company has settled claims totalling about £5 million in the past four or five years. Forty claims have been settled within the past three years, of which five or six have been fatalities. So we know there is a need." The NCPTA has written to every school in the country at least twice in recent years and

"We continue to try," Mr Whiting says. "It is disappointing, but I do not see what else we can do. If we could achieve the level that they do in independent schools, it would bring the cost down even

The new health guidelines soon to be issued to schools will include safety recommendations for the first time.

Second go at courses

STUDENTS WHO this year fail to achieve their expected Alevel grades are being offered an improved chance to find vacancies on other courses at universities, polytechnics and

Campus 2000, the computerised education network, can provide high-speed access to course vacancies as they are daily updated by the Universities Central Council on Admissions and the Polytechnic Central Admission System. The service, known as

"clearing", operates from a database compiled by The Times Network Systems Limited and Prestel Education, and will be supplemented each day in The Times by the publication of vacancies and tele-phone numbers for all local education authority careers officers, who can give more information on courses.

Last year, about 179,000 students competed for 19,000 places during clearing, which this year is from August 22 to September 21. Gordon Jones, of Campus 2000, says: "The database means students can find vacancies more quickly."

Credential check

PARENTS WHOSE children are being examined by educational psychologists will be able to check the credentials of specialists through the first Register of Chartered Psychologists, published today.

The British Psychological Society says that it has made the register available to combat a growth in the number of people who are offering educational advice in the private sector without proper qualifications. A spokesman for the society says that many people are turning to educational psychologists for a second opinion on their children's ability to meet the National Curriculum.

John Thacker, the chairman of the society's educational and child division, says: "Parents should look for the titles 'chartered' and 'C. psychol.' to be assured of a qualified professional."

Top marks

A SURVEY of 600 academics throughout Europe has found that English universities are ranked top for more than half of the 21 subjects scrutinised.

The survey, published by Lib-ération, the French newspaper, placed Cambridge top overall, history, biology, chemistry and physics. Other English winners were Oxford, Imperial College, London, and the London School of Economics,

Vandals lose

A COMPREHENSIVE school has won a large share of the world's richest education prize. Seven years ago, Lilian Baylis School, in Lambeth, south London, was spending thousands of pounds a week on repairing damage caused by vandals. A programme to in-volve parents in the discipline of the school has since made vandalism rare. The 578-pupil school won £100,000 of the £150,000 Jerwood Award for educational achievement. The award, in its second year, attracted 368 nominations from schools and organisations involved in the education of children aged five to 18. The prize is financed by John Jerwood, a pearl merchant.

Voting video

LABOUR-CONTROLLED Camden council has helped to produce a video for its sixthformers urging them to use their right to vote. The 12-minute video, No Vote = No Say, is decribed as a "forceful programme presented by young people who are strongly committed". There is no mention of the causes to which they are committed. The company that directed the film, Invidio, says that by providing an opportunity to discuss "democracy, women's rights and the future role of Europe", the video will help teachers implement the national curriculum's "education for citizenship" requirement.

A young business

TWO BRITISH schools took part this weekend in the first European Young Company of the Year competition, held in Cork, Ireland. Pupils from Pate's Grammer School, Cheltenham, in Gloucestershire, and Longridge High School, in Lancashire, earned the right to compete against young people from Belgium, Ireland, Sweden and Malta after setting up their own small businesses. Those from Longridge formed a toy company, while students at Pate's devised a card game to teach beginners to read music.

Temping for queen and country An answer to a small problem?

As the Territorial Army prepares to play a bigger role, Sally Brompton finds out what attracts women to soldiering of the Rhine, is likely to mean an expanded role for our Territorial Army. Traditionally the butt of disparag-ing comments from their full-time counterparts, who refer to them as Weekend Warriors or the SAS (Saturdays and Sundays), the TA none the less sent 350,000 soldiers off to defend their country at the outbreak of the second world war,

British Army. With their numbers now down to about 74,000, the TA is poised to renew its recruitment efforts, especially among women, who cur-rently account for less than ten per cent of the total force.

and they still make up a third of the

Despite the announces Tom King, the defence secretary, that he wants the reserve forces to play a more prominent role, the TA is waiting to discover precisely what that role will be. In the meantime, there is an air of contained excitement and expectation in the ranks, and many people feel that the value of their contribution to the "one-army concept" is finally to be recognised.

"One would hope that a lot of the regulars leaving the army will join the Territorial Army," says Cor-poral Fiona Small, aged 28, of the Royal Engineers Topographical Unit, who was twice turned down by the regular army. "It would be a shame to lose all that experience. But so many regulars have a lack of respect for the TA. They think we're just there for a jolly time. I really think the regular army needs to know more about the TA and to realise that we're as good at our jobs as they are at theirs. We just spend less time doing them.'

The TA takes recruits from the age of 17%, although most are aged between 18 and 24. Retirement is normally compulsory at 50, but the average length of service is less than three years. Territorials must be prepared to spend two weeks a year at camp or on a course, plus a minimum of six weekends with their unit (two or three weekends for members of specialist units such as Queen Alexandra's Royal Army Nursing Corps).

Unlike the regular army, there is no separate female unit in the TA. and women are employed alongside male soldiers as doctors, nurses, mechanical and electrical engineers. Some choose trades in which they are already skilled, while others try something different from their civil-

According to the Ministry of Defence, the fact that they are parttimers is the only difference between the TA troops and the regulars. The training, pay, responsibilities, chain of command, promotion prospects and uniforms are identical, although Major Trevor Boocock, the TA's head of recruitment for London, points out that the range of punishments is counterparts, the women are prevented by the Geneva Convention from taking a full combative role. They do, however, learn to handle sub-machine guns, self-loading ri-fies and pistols and how to defend themselves and their fellow soldiers

Corporal Small would like to see a separate, all-woman fighting unit. "I see no reason why women shouldn't be a fighting force, especially with the lack of manpower at the moment, I think women could be more ruthless killers than men because I think they can be more cold-blooded about things."

She joined the TA when she moved south from Aberdeen after. leaving university five years ago, "as a way of meeting people who had something in common with me". Her parents had been in the army, but she was turned down for the regular army when she was 19 on the grounds of being immature.

"I'd been to a Scottish boarding school and they do treat you as if you are very young." She had already joined the TA when she reapplied nine years later. She did not ask the reason when she was rejected a second time. "I was pretty

In the Territorials, her trade is combat surveyor, "commonly known as a map stacker". In civilian life, she has just left her job as a personal assistant to work as a temporary secretary.

She says that she is more ambitious in her army life. "In civilian life I know that I'm not going to get further than being a good PA, whereas in the TA the sky's the limit. I'm always competing for promotion against men. I'm ambitious to get there before they do. I don't think being a woman matters. We're soldiers who can do the job as

"When I put on my uniform I'm not just putting on green kit that makes me look like everybody else, I'm putting on years and years of tradition that stands for so much."

She says it took her about a year to be accepted by her male colleagues. "Some senior non-commissioned officers don't like having women in because it was like a boys' club before. Obviously, when you're breaking new ground, you have to be better and sometimes you can overdo it and look pushy. For example, I used to try to keep up drinking with them. But it doesn't do you any favours and they're not impressed with that sort of thing. It took me a while to realise that I could be female and still accepted for the job I'm doing."

In common with their male counterparts, the TA's women come from a cross-section of backgrounds and professions. The regular and Territorial officers in charge talk about leadership, fulfilment, achievement and character development. The reality is that some women join to make friends or get fit. A 25-year-old captain who met her boyfriend in the TA suggests that perhaps one of the attractions is the men in uniform.

Dublin-born officer cadet Charlotte Cullen, aged 24, who is reading business studies at London University, joined because "it just seemed challenge". The first time she spent the night lying on the wet ground doing sentry duty, she admits that "I didn't know what had hit me. There are pleaty of times when you're cold, miserable, tired and hungry, when you think, 'What am I doing here?' You try to sing just to stop yourself from crying. Despite the hardships, she admits that the officer cadet training has become an important part of her already crowded infestyle. "It's what I enjoy most.

Sergeant Kim Burt, aged 29, joined the TA 10 years ago to give herself something to do at weekends other than "sit at home and watch television and iron. When I first joined I was excited. I had a uniform. I was a member of the army and I started to meet people. The TA feels very like a family. Everyone looks after everyone Already working on a switch-board in her civilian job, she chose to work as a telecommunications operator. "Ten years ago girls didn's have a lot to choose from and I enjoyed doing it. Being in the TA has made me a better person and a

Her commitment is total, although she says "the day I leave the TA is the day I marry. But I've got to stay at least another two years to get my long service medal, just so there's something to show for it and all the heartache and tears."

Helping water clean up its act

THIS summer, once again, as the water in the reservoirs has declined, the number of alien rastes and even stranger creahas increased.

But treating one defect in the water often creates another: if nitrates are re-moved with chloride, for example, the water becomes more acidic and the solubility of aluminium increases dramatically. In the meantime, even "safe" water often tastes unpleasant.

But there are ways of cleaning up water. The cheapest and most basic system is a jug with a filter in the lid. For example, Boots's 21 version costs £10.99, including a cartridge which will process. about 601 of water-reduced aluminium, lead, heavy metals, iron, chlorine and nitrates.

Recently, the company also introduced "in-line" filters. These must be plumbed into an extra tap at the kitchen sink. They cost £89.99 and clean up about 1,500l of water before they need a new cartridge. However, in-line filters do not remove nitrates.

But scientists point out that unless appliances suit the local water and are properly maintained, the customer runs the risk of ending up with water that is less good than the standard supply from the tap. Specialist retailers in this field are comparatively rare. The Pure Water People advises customers on how to-obtain analysis of their water supply. Depending on the results, PWP will advise filtration or purification, supply the necessary equipment and con-tact a qualified local plumber to instal it. Water Options International offers a similar

Positive case of revisionism

On the eve of the British première of a Russian play which was written at the turn of the century, Benedict Nightingale meets RSC director David Jones, whose company has made a case for the author, Maxim Gorky, to be ranked alongside Chekhov

he Royal Shakespeare Company made some unforgettable contributions to theatrical history in the 1970s. There was its première of Pinter's haunt-ing memory-play Old Times, and there was Peter Brook's production of A Midsummer Night's Dream, with its acrobats, trapezists and sci-fi fizz and glitter. There was also its discovery that Maxim Gorky was a major dramatist, second only to Chekhov in the Russian pantheon.

For the insular British, this came as a surprise. True, we had known and respected Gorky's portrait of drifters in their Moscow dosshouse, The Lower Depths; but we trusted such academics as Allardyce Nicholl and Andrew MacAndrew, who shrugged off his other plays as "essentially mediocre" and "dated". And then, on a mindsplintering evening in 1971, came the RSC's revival of Gorky's Enemies, followed by The Lower Depths itself, Summerfolk, The Zykovs and Children of the Sun.
By the end of the decade the director David Jones could argue that Gorky was "as great as Chekhov" without reducing any-one to titters of incredulous

Jones was certainly entitled to exaggerate a bit, because he had personally exhumed and staged all those plays except one. That was Children of the Sun, which Jones somewhat unwillingly handed over to Terry Hands after going off in 1979 to run the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

In return for his self-denial, however, Jones struck a bargain. The RSC would not present Gorky's Barbarians until he was able to direct it. Watching someone else's production of that play, Jones implied, would be like witnessing the deflowering of a loved one; and, when the RSC asked him for permission to tackle it in the mid-1980s, he firmly told them to keep their hands (and their Hands) to themselves.

Well, there will no longer be need for restraint after tomorrow night. That is when Jones at last opens the British première of Barbarians, belatedly completing what he sees as a distinct cycle. With the exception of The Zykovs, which dates from 1913, all the RSC's Gorky plays were written between 1902 and 1906, at a time of turmoul in both the dramatist's life and Russia itself. The Tsar's regime was teetering. The 35-year-old Alexei Peshkov, alias Gorky (which is Russian for "bitter"), disappeared into the notorious Peter and Paul prison, emerged to prepare for armed insurrection, then fled to Finland, Germany and the United States.

"It was a white-hot time for him, politically and creatively," Jones says. "I'm not sure he consciously decided to write a series of works about Mother Russia, but that's what he ended up doing."

Each of his plays in this period takes a critical look at a different section of a fragmented, floundering society, ready for change but unable to see how to achieve it.
The Lower Depths is mainly about the losers, the outcasts; Summerfolk involves the nouvenux riches, chattering, bickering, philosophising and playing cards in their holiday villas, and Barbarians is set in a small town, peopled by descendants of the characters of Gogol's Government Inspector, but this time invaded by engineers bringing the railway to the Russian outback.

Enemies, in Jones's view the finest of the lot, is nakedly about class conflict. Beautiful people, among them well-meaning liberals, saunter across their lawns, enjoying what seems to be a 24hour picnic, only to be confronted by revolt in the local factory and the murder of its hard-nosed boss.

On each side there is a closing of ranks, polarisation: "enemies". As a capriciously garnered crowd of workers are led away, snarling defiance from beneath the hoods over their heads, it is possible to understand, and at a level no history book could teach, just why 1917 was inevitable.

Chekhov, too, saw upheaval ahead. His more earnest characters were always prophesying the collapse of a world that troubled them as much as it did Gorky. But Chekhov died before the violence of 1905, did not share his friend and colleague's radicalism, and tended to focus on the upper classes. His work had neither the social sweep nor the political punch of Gorky.

The student in The Cherry Orchard is not in an underground cell or being investigated by the authorities," points out Jones.
"But that is often the case in Gorky, because such events impinged more on his life. For him Russia was a massive police state, full of spies and provocateurs." Even in Barbarians, a far less obviously "political" play than Enemies, one of the more unappealing characters is a part-time informer, whose whisperings have caused two deaths.

would of course be superficial to argue that this makes Gorky a bigger writer than Chekhov. On the contrary, his revolutionary convictions could easily leave him looking dated, limited, small. Yet there is nothing shrill or propagandist about his work. If he does not have Chekhov's munificence of spirit - who does? - be can write with generosity about the nob classes and with unsentimentality about the poor.

"His curiosity and fascination with people was so intense," says Jones, "that even the weakest and most repulsive come across as startling, fresh and original on the put, and put it."

The effect is of richness, abundance and unpredictability. Hidden feelings burst into the open, making it clear how much has been subtextually seething. The tone veers from the comic to the painful, the absurd to the ugly.
One of Jones's own favourite moments in Barbarians comes when a small-town femme fatale confronts the morose doctor terminally obsessed with her. He abjectly pleads for her attention, she tells him he has rotten teeth, he declares she has "oceans of love hidden inside", she breezily dis-misses him as "ridiculous".

"It is a mixture you get in Chekhov," says Jones, "but bolder, laid on with oils and not water colours. You get behing great laughs at incredibly poignant, wolariling moments."

That volatility, he thinks, helps explain why Gorky has been neglected in Britain. English audiences resist mood-swings so ex-treme, and performers find them

But the human restlessness he ered in itself in the 1970s. Suddenly a conversation about truth and beauty in Children of the Sun was interrupted by the entry of what looked like a blend of the Incredible Hulk and Bill Sykes: the local blacksmith drunkenly pursuing his wife with a stick. As the factory owner of Enemies sprawled dead over the samovar, an eccentric old general cantered onstage, roaring with delight and slapping his batman, who was posing as a horse.

in The Lower Depths an old actor equally unexpectedly asked his fellow derelicts to pray for him and then went off with a laugh and a shrug to hang himself, an event greeted with the line: "He's spoiled our song, the fool."

It was daringly real and, for all its period feeling, not without latter-day meaning. It is hard sonedays to supportain with the nowadays to sympathise with the kind of cure Gorky sought — did he not end up disillusioned by the revolution, exiled by Lenin and possibly murdered by Stalin?

Hell to heaven, via purgatory

ABANDON hope all ye who enter here: Peter Greenaway, whose films have won the top prizes for advanced intellectual and visual obscurity at festivals all over the known critical world, comes to television with the first eight cantos of A TV Danie, Danie's Inferno, two cantos at a time, starting last night and running starting last night and running through to Wednesday on Channel 4. Bob Peck is Dante, a talking head surrounded by baroque Greenaway images and human footnotes—he has only to mention a leopard for David Attenborough to leap into vision with its sexual symbolism. Sir John Gielgud, in magnificent voice is Vigil though no sooner voice, is Virgil, though no sooner was he in place last night than David Rudkin popped up to give a brief guide to his life and work.

Veering from a schools-television lecture through the high gimmickry of split screens to moments of splendid drama and insight, the television Dante is a hotchpotch of poetry and ped-antry, at worst the basis for a Ken Russell musical and at best the first real attempt to get Dante in front of the television cameras. Stay with it: tonight and tomorrow the films get stronger and more confident as the format and rhythms of the Tom Phillips adaptation grow more familiar, and by Wednesday we are at canto

That leaves only another 92 to go, with about 24 already in the can. It is to be hoped that Channel 4, which already shows signs of being rather less enthu-siastic about its Inferno than it was at the outset, will not fail to make the Grade by seeing an increasingly ambitious project through to its ultimate infernal conclusion.

For some, the concept of true television hell is watching Leslie Crowther interviewing a working mother who has a passion for dressing up as Barbra Streisand, but who then gives a faintly inadequate impression of Petula Clark. FYODOR Abramov died in 1983. too early to see his mordant diagnoses of Soviet ills confirmed by later governments. Soon after his death the Maly Theatre of Leningrad staged Lev Dodin's version of his epic novel and the company has now brought this large-scale work to Glasgow for the "5 Theatres of the World" season, playing it on two successive evenings (tonight and tomorrow will be the last performances) or, in the form I saw it, on the afternoon and evening of one

In 1988 the Maly brought Stars in the Morning Sky to Glasgow, and then to London, where it won an Olivier Award. Its portrait of a group of prostitutes, shoved out of Moscow to make the city clean for the Olympics, showed a freshness of treatment that the much earlier style of Brothers and Sisters cannot lay claim to. The spaciousness of the work is very different, of course, 60 actors and six hours of play, and there is undeniably accumulative power (in the first part anyway) as one naturalistic scene in committee room follows another in street or lumber camp. Yet the theme of gathering disillusion has long jost the element of

What the CBSO lacks in string bloom (which is not much) it makes up with its coiled-spring alertness. Rattle moulded the music like a potter working clay: some moments wistfully pulled back, others thrust forward with an astonishingly attack. Everywhere there was shining clarity of purpose and execution. Halfway through the first movement, incidentally, part of an overhead light came crashing into the orchestra: lucky that Brahms wrote no vibraphone part, because he would have had no player on

CBSO/Rattle Albert Hall

THE American composer John Adams has made mountains out of minimalism. Never one to dodge the Big Issue, he wrote his now-famous opera, Nixon in China, as a kind of modern-day Rhinegold - with politicians, instead of Norse gods, hustling for world domination. Improbable though it may seem, his next opera is about the 1985 Achille Lauro hijacking. And in Harmonium, written in 1981 but here receiving its London première, the subject matter is again portentous: love, death and liebestod.

Concerto, written for Steven Isserlis to play beautifully (it must be said that nobody writes for Isserlis to do anything else), seems rather nicely to take account, in a somewhat Berio-like fashion, of the fact of joining a game that has been going on a long time. particularly at the opening, where a solo cello from the orchestra begins to ruminate to a piano accompaniment whose innocent gestures suggest "once upon a When the real soloist enters. with full orchestral support, it is to inject a very much more eruptive manner, but in fact the concerto

only properly gets going when the solo cello begins to counter its orchestral usurper with slow melody of its own.

The message appears to be that one extends from the past not by brutal opposition but by a judicious bending away, and from that point Powers creates a magical movement for the soloist to play with different orchestral

However, the naïve piano idea recurs towards the end, as it does in each of the two subsequent movements, so that the concerto's great reach is always, deliberately. a little unsettled, and the final C

For an encore, Beck produced instrumental versions of "People Get Ready" and his old calling card "Going Down" before a final blitzkrieg which he ended by forcibly wrenching all six strings in a tangled mass from the body of the wailing guitar. Mellow it was

ROCK

IN A devastating display of virtuoso delicacy and heavy metal brutality, Jeff Beck confirmed his status as the greatest living rock guitarist. He was joined by the two other outstanding talents featured on last year's Guitar Shop album: Terry Bozzio (ex-Frank Zappa and U.K.), a man who treats drumming rather like a martial art, and Tony Hymas, the classically trained session player who has been Beck's preferred choice on keyboards since he parted company with his old sparring partner Jan Hammer.

With no singer, no bass player, no stage set, and just enough lighting to create a sensible ambience, the trio began with a swift rampage through some of the Guitar Shop highlights

The jazzy swing of "Savoy" gave way to the bluesy jerks and stabs of the album's title track, as the bare-chested Bozzio loomedup off his stool to give his sinister black cymbals the most fearful whiplashing, and show off the gold chain which was suspended between his two pierced nippies while he was about it. The volume rose to a punishing extreme for the heavy rock fusion of "Sling Shot", an extended piece of epic complexity and visceral intensity. In white tee-shirt, faded blue jeans and still with a fuil thatch of realistically dark hair, Beck looked remarkably unchanged from his days as a Sixties godhead in the Yardbirds and his own Jeff Beck Group (with Rod Stewart and Ron Wood). More important than this was his similarly unchanged appetite for the task in hand. Having given so sparingly of himself in recent times (just three albums released in the last 12 years) he has been able to preserve the take-noprisoners approach that has long since deserted contemporaries such as Eric Clapton and Jimmy

"Behind the Veil", a softer reggae number, was the perfect vehicle for the more lyrical side of Beck's playing. Using thumb and fingers (as he did for most of the show) instead of a plectrum, he made constant, minutely detailed adjustments to tone controls and tremelo bar as he coaxed a sepulchral treble sound from the

While inside Boyle discovered talents as a writer and a sculptor and his film is a plea for the youngsters of lodgy not to be written off as he was. He maintains that there is creative potentialin everyone, if only it is allowed to come to the surface. Boyle has a positive story to tell in his own

Gerveral The punchy current affairs series ends its present run with a less than complementary profile of General Nonlega of Panama and the unedifying story of his 30 years as a paid agent of the United States The pattern is a familiar one, of American fear of communism leading it to be saddled with disreputable alikes. World in Action claims to reveal fresh evidence. Nonega's involvement in the drugs trade, for which he is awaiting that, was well known to the Americans back to 1971 but friends in high places kept him sale from prosecution. Bizarrely, the plumbers of the Nixon regime planned to have him assassinated and he was dropped from the CIA payroll under Jammy Carter Spotting an ally in his crusade against Nicaragua, Reagain brought him back at double the fee. ventually patience ran out and President Bush mounted America's biggest display of force since Vietnam to bring Nonega to trial

9,00 Murder East, Murder Wes The demoirtion of the Berlin Walt has been marvellous news to everyone except the makers of television dramas based on the east-west divide. To an extent Murder East, Murder West has been overtaken by the events of last year. Forced to accept that the wall is no longer there. Ted Whitehead's screenplay has to overcome the disadvantage that half the story is concerned with illegal smuggling across the border. His solution is extended flashbacks but they look like making the best of an uncomfortable job Fortunately the drama has a strong second string, involving the erstwhile smuggler (Jeroen Krabbe) and two women One (Suzama Hamiton) is an heress he brought out from the east and marned, the other (Joanne Pearce) a former grifinend and junke who reenters his life at an embarrassing moment. All is set for an elaborate game of treachery and revenge which more than compensates for the sluggish opening. Most of the honours go to Pearce, an

Today's edition of the Asian affairs programme presented by Shyama Perera examines the successes in the community and some of its failures. The Prince of Wales talks about his Youth Business Trust, which donates money to help young Asian entrepreneurs. Two are examined one already a millionaire, the other fast becoming one. On the other side of the coin, we see the plight of two Asian girls jailed for drugs offences. One admits her crime, the other says she driving contained. But both have eeen old values and attitudes change as they came up against the very harsh realities of being Asien, in a predominantly white jail

7.30 Now The War Is Over From Childle to Grave. The welfare state and the health service are examined today in this series of filtre about Britain from 1945 to 1951. Initially, the British Medical Association strongly resisted Aneurin Bevan's plans to set up a national health service. Doctors, nurses and patients remember the stormy days of its inception (r) 8.10 Where on Earth Are We Going?:

now straying on to more controversial ground, with Porntt arguing that the developed world is stacking the odds against the under-developed world in trade and development terms. Porritt contends that the third world needs "sustainable development", which he claims is fundamentally different from that on offer as a by-product of trading with the West. Costa Rica is given as an example, which has undertaken some progressive steps such as abolishing its army, introducing lamily planning and protecting its runlorests from destruction. In the studio arguing the point with him are the environment secretary Frances Carncross of The cretary Chris Patten.

2.30 Home at Seven (1952, b/w). R. C. Shemit's play about a bank clerk suspected of having committed theft and murder while suffering a loss of memory was brought to the screen by Raiph Richardson, who had successfully played the part on the West End stage. It was Richardson's only stab at film direction and if he takes no risks his negative control and sure handling of the cast (which apart from himself includes Margaret

Relph Richardson: loss of memory (2.30pm)

Leighton and Jack Hawkins) suggests that this could have been a fruitful career Presumably to the delight of his employer, Sir Alexander Korda, he kept the budget down by shooting the film in only 13 days. Interestingly, one of the reviews likened Richardson's technique to that of television, still very much feeling its way in 1952. As for Richardson the actor, his David Preston is an example of the faintly bewildered ordinary man that he did so well. Leighton plays his wife and Hawkins is his doctor.

PM gave in on Europe 'for unity'

By PHILIP WEBSTER, CHIEF POLITICAL CORRESPONDEN

NORMAN Tebbit said yes- exercise to freeze out Sir Alan terday that the prime minister Walters, the prime minister's had conceded ground to her former economic adviser, opponents on Europe in order because of discordant views to avoid destroying the on the European exchange rate Conservative party, and was mechanism (ERM). biding her time to let events make her case for her.

chairman spoke as it emerged resigned from the cabinet two weeks ago, is preparing to play a key backbench role in a Conservative rearguard action against the cabinet's approach to European union.

Mr Ridley has told antifederalist Conservative MPs that he has no intention of being silenced, and that he will be fully involved in their campaign, although he intended to refrain from any attacks on the prime minister,

He is expected to make a series of speeches setting out the case against further integration. A source close to him said yesterday that he regarded it as by far the most serious issue facing Britain.

The misgivings of the Tory right over the direction of policy on Europe have been fuelled by the appointment in last week's reshuffle of Tristan Garel-Jones, an enthusiastic pro-European, as a Foreign Office minister of state with responsibility for the EC.

There was also angar on the right yesterday over what it claimed to be a co-ordinated

Trinidad rebels. claim deal

with explosive devices.

There was no reliable estimate of other casualties, Most estimates put deaths at more than 20, with many more injured. The military cordoned off the area within a quarter-mile radius of the parliament building, known as the Red House. Mr Abdulah denied an earlier report that the rebels had requested a plane to Libya. "We are Trinidadians and we are living right here, and we don't intend to go to Libya," he said.

The airport reopened yesterday morning, but a curfew remained in force from 6pm to 6am throughout the counthe centre of Port of Spain and around Television House.

As the standoff continued in the capital between the de-fence force and the Jamast al-Muslimeen, serious looting continued in the suburbs

Whitehall sources have made plain that Sir Alan's The former Conservative opinions, given an airing last week in his new book Sterling that Nicholas Ridley, who in Danger, play no part in government policy. They confirmed yesterday that Mrs Thatcher has not seen Sir Alan for two months.

Friends of Mr Ridley believe that Mrs Thatcher is the prisoner of her cabinet over Europe, and that she has been forced by the strength of the alliance between Douglas Hurd, the foreign secretary, and John Major, the chan-cellor, to make concessions

This view was echoed by Mr Tebbit in an interview on The World This Weekend on BBC Radio 4. He likened her behaviour to that of the Russians generals during the Napoleonic wars. "She would rather cede territory to those who oppose her views than she would run the risk of destroying the party," he said. "The Russian generals ceded territory rather than run the risk of destroying the army. She does not want a corn laws type dispute of the sort that split the Conservative party the nineteenti

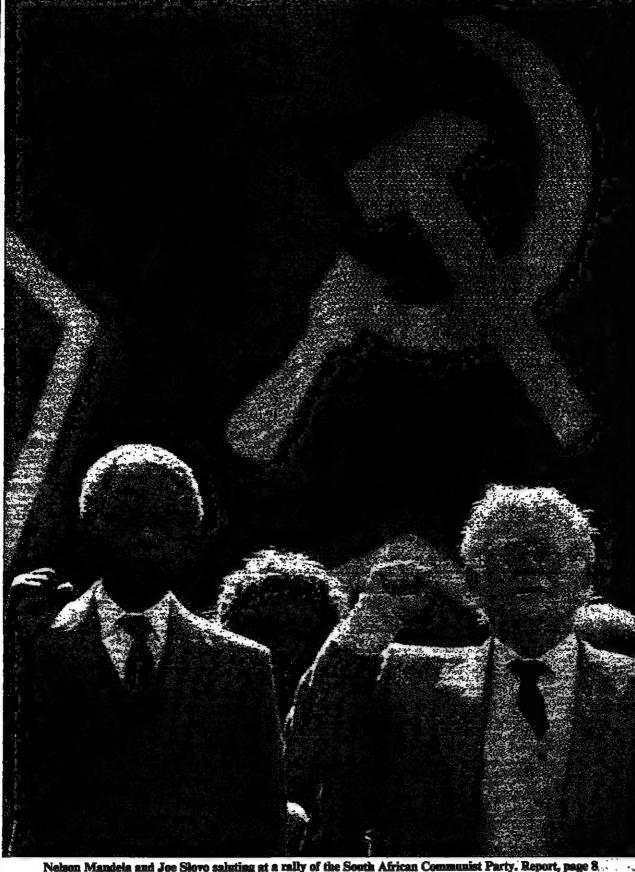

Mr Tebbit added: "There fore I think she is waiting to let events make her case. I am sure they will over the next

The coolness towards Sir Alan in Downing Street is adding to speculation that entry to the ERM could be imminent. A source close to Mr Ridley said yesterday: That fox has been shot, but the real battle is only just getting under way." In his BBC interview Mr

Tebbit said that the Conservative priority should be education. He said it was a pity they had not started education reform earlier, "Today, there are children of 16 leaving school who were just starting when this government came to office. We could have benefited a lot more children if we could have improved education earlier."

Mr Tebbit also urged the government to take a much harder look at its welfare benefits policy to see whether some benefits, rather than alleviating need, were creating

"Spending money doesn't necessarily make a kinder or more caring Britain," he said. He asked: "Are we spending the money in the right way or is some spending counter productive?"

Sheffield, where funny is peculiar By ROBIN STACEY

THE seventh International Conference on Humour opened in Sheffield last night. But few laughs are expected: the conference organiser, an American anthropologist, admits he is incapable of telling a joke "to save my life".

Over the coming week, 107 humour experts will hear scores of academic papers on the uses and abuses of humour, from breaking the uneasy atmosphere of a doctor's surgery to deflating self-important politicians in the conference organiser, the gathering itself is quite, quite serious. Could be remember any bon mots from previous conferences, the last of them in Hawaii? 'No." said Mr Glazer, who admits be had never cracked the artforms of timing and delivery.

"Some of us will be going out of our way to be a little bit funny during informal gatherings in between the sessions because frankly there is a tendency for the whole thing to become rather serious," said Dr Glazer last night. "The only snag is I for one cannot tell a joke to save my life. To tell a joke you need timing, intonation and of course a good memory, which are three things I found out I did not have when I was still at school. I will be trying to amuse people with witty one-liners and spontaneous

And when the British contingent can be seen with wry smiles, it betrays more the irony of the gathering's location than the atmosphere of controlled mirth. Dr Glazer balks at any such idea. Sheffield University was chosen for the the bed and board on offer for £246. As for the mid-week excursion for delegates. it would be hard to imagine anything

Conference delegates are almost all academics. They have come to hear the latest research into the psychological, educational and sociological explana-tions for humour. A handful have other concerns. Several make a living offering advice on how to introduce humour into the surgery, the office, or the courtroom with the specific intention of masking to be conducted there.

"By bringing humour into your personality, you change the way people look at you," said Dr Glazer. "It can be used just as easily to put a patient at his ease in the hospital or to hide the naked ambition of a business manager."

Three dead after trawler capsizes

THREE members of the crew King Juan Carlos of Spain of a French trawler were dived into the Mediterranean drowned yesterday and a sea and rescued two girls from fourth is missing after their a small sail boat which cap-vessel capsized 30 miles off sized because of strong wing the Sussex coast when, it is according to the Diario di understood, its nets were Mallorca yesterday caught on a wreck on the sea

A major rescue operation, co-ordinated by coastguards at Lee on Solent, Hampshire, and involving divers, coastguards, helicopters, lifeboats and other fishing vessels, was launched when the Ar-Roak, based at Dieppe, was found floating upturned by the British trawler Seabreeze 2.

Two members of the crew were rescued from the sea, one by a coastguard helicopter, the other by the French trawler. Port Manek, which had joined the search and which later recovered a body. They could have been in the Channel for more than four hours before being rescued. The survivors were flown to hospital in Brighton where one of them is in a serious condition. Divers from the Royal Navy diving centre at Port-land recovered two other bodies from inside the vessel. At country, first it was thought that only five men had been aboard the vessel but one of the two survivors told rescuers that there has been a crew of six aboard the ship.

Solent coastguard, who are still co-ordinating the search for the missing sixth crew member, say the 50ft vessel is floating upside down in the water and is fixed in the same position because its nets are trapped on the sea bed.

The shipping maritime ac-cident investigation branch of the Department of Transport has been informed of the accident and will begin investigations today. A coastguard spokesman said they would concentrate the inquiry on whether the vessel was pulled over after snagging its trawling nets on a wreck.

"It is too soon to speculat exactly what happened, but this is a definite possibility. The nets are trapped on a sea at this stage, we don't know,"

The trawler was still fixe to the sea bed by its trawl when we reached it and that gave us a good marking point to work from. There is still one man missing but hoves for his

The air and see rescue operation was issueched by the Vewhaven based Scabn discovered the appurped hall shortly after 7 amyesterday. Two obastiment belicopters later repeateds and a lifebout were scrambled further back and joined by five other sels in the area during search for survivors. The two early yesterday and was consurviving crew members were found floating three miles away from their vessel shortly before noon.

Schroders, the government's merchant bank adviser on the privatisation, said a small number of reminders had gone astray, mostly because of changes in address. Enquiries about missing reminders had been below average for big privatisations. Investors are obliged to pay the second and third instalments on time, whether or not they receive reminders. Un-like some earlier privatisations, however, advertisements were not taken out to remind the public of the deadline because they were judged not to be cost-effective.

Small shareholders who missed the deadline will not be penalised if they send their cheques quickly by first-class post, although the deadline will be more rigorously enforced on large shareholdings.

Neau panic | Congressmen step up fight against foreign invasion

AMERICAN congressmen, alarmed by the number of companies being taken over by foreigners, have introduced a raft of bills recently to try to impose new burdens on foreign-owned companies and give their local rivals a competitive advantage.

The Bush administration has been battling to tear down barriers to American investment abroad and is firmly opposed to this tide of hostility towards foreign investment, both on ideological grounds and from fear of retaliation.

But the congressmen, mostly Democrats, enjoy support from industry, parts of the federal bureaucracy and a public appalled by Japanese purchases of such quintessentially American concerns as New York's Rockefeller Center, CBS quintessentially American concerns as New York's Rockefeller Center, CBS inevitable consequences of buge American trade and budget deficits, "It's very tures. Politicians such as Richard Gephardt, the House majority leader, show every sign of seeking to turn foreign investment into a potent electoral issue.

Direct foreign investment has increased more than sixfold in ten years and now exceeds $408 billion, with British companies accounting for $118 billion of that. But it is Japanese investment that has aroused latent American zenophobia.

"What we're seeing is the political reflection of the loss by the US of its position as the dominant force in the world," said Elliot Richardson, the former US Attorney General and chairman of the Association of International Investment.

He accuses the politicians of seeking

The first important legislation enacte by Congress in this area was the Exon-Florio provision of the 1988 Trade Act, which empowered the president to stop foreign takeovers of American companie on grounds of national security after review by the Committee on Foreign Investment in the US (CFIUS).

Only one such takeover has been halted under the act, but there is mounting evidence of American companies trying to turn it into an anti-takeover device, with the Massachusetts Norton Company's defence against a hostile bid by Britain's Bills now before Congress would oblige

CFIUS to justify its decisions annually to Congress, require it to investigate any foreign takeover involving "essential" American technologies; and strengthen the power within CFIUS of the commerce and defence departments, the two branches of government most eager to extend controls. Measures to increase the taxes paid by foreign-owned companies look inevitable. Congressional investigations suggest they use creative accounting to pay far less tax declared Republican congressman Duncan Hunter, echoing a general concensus on Capitol Hill.

Two of the most influential House members, Mr Gephardt and Dan Rostenkowski, chairman of the ways and means committee, have introduced legislation to strengthen the enforcement powers of the Internal Revenue Service and subtly change taxes for foreign-owned firms.

Other bills are designed to glean and more widely disseminate accurate data about the extent of foreign ownership in America and the effect on the economy. Not all the measures will become law, but a few will and the drive against foreign investment is gathering momentum. As Brad Larschan, counsel to the Association for International Investment, said: "It's open season on foreign investors,"

Unification costs soar over budget

By Wolfgang Munchau, European Business correspondent

COSTS of German monetary union are running ahead of estimates only four weeks after the Deutschmark was introduced into East Germany.

A shortfall in funds has forced the East German government to raise up to DM1 billion on financial markets. Under an arrangement with the Bundesbank, East and West German banks will be invited to participate in a tender offer to buy short-term securities. East Germany's state budget provides a total financial market borrowing capacity of DM10 billion, and further capital market issues are expected.

The extent of the funding sbortfall became apparent when the Treuhandanstalt, the agency in charge of privatisation and transitional finance for East German industry, could meet two fifths of the demand for loans.

September, and rising social security costs. Unemployment was 220,000 in mid-July but the East German employment ministry now fears a rise to 1.5 million, about 20 per cent of the workforce.

The East German finance ministry has based its budget projections for unemployment allowances on an unemployment rate of 440,000 by the end of the year. But on current trends this is expected to be reached by mid-August.

During the next two months, the Treuhandanstalt will phase out the grants and ask companies to start repaying some of the loans. It is estimated that this might lead to a collapse of 30 per cent to 50 per cent of East German It is now certain that the popularity of short-time work. which offers companies an alternative to redundancies. Under short-time working hours, staff work a minimum amount of time, or sometimes not at all, while the government picks up two thirds of the wages bill.

The provisions for shorttime work have been criticised because they drain government funds to protect jobs which will have to go soon anyway. Klaus Höfner, a business consultant, said: "Instead of putting the money into companies the government is subsidising workers to go on short time. If it drags on, the companies soon won't exist."

Heavy pay rises of up to 100 per cent are adding to the difficulties of East German companies. West German trade unions, which are in charge of the negotiations in East Germany, claim that the rises would only compensate workers for higher food prices and new income tax and social security payments. However, a narrowing wage differential between East and West Germany is likely to lead to a fall in investment by West German companies, unless East German productivity, only 40 per cent of West German

PowerGen likely to pile on provisions

By MARTIN WALLER

POTENTIAL bidders for PowerGen will have a clearer idea of the assets on sale when the company presents its accounts for the year to end-March tomorrow, although these are likely to be little more illuminating than those of the bigger National Power unveiled last week.

PowerGen is likely to load as many restructuring costs as possible into its last full year as a government-owned body. Analysts are looking for total provisions of about £360 milion, therefore, and an attributable loss of £70 million to £80 million for the year. Perhaps £170 million will be taken "above the line" as exceptionals, comprising a raft of provisions, including those for plant repair costs and

But John Wakeham, energy secretary, denied a report in The Sunday Correspondent that Electricité de France, the French state-owned utility, might be allowed to acquire PowerGen. US chiefs feel pinch as profits fall

From John Durie in New York

US corporate profits are down and it is starting to hurt chief executives at their most vulnerable point, their own pay cheques. Last year, chief executive pay rose only 3.4 per cent, compared with a 4.9 per cent increase in white-collar professionals' pay cheques and 3.7 per cent in blue-collar workers' pay.

Reebok's chairman, Paul Fireman, is taking an $11.6 million-a-year pay cut this year and in a new five-year contract will get a maximum of only $2 million a year instead of the $13.6 million he has averaged over the last four years.

managers are rewarded more in share options than cash in hand. Between 1985 and 1989 Reebok profit increased from $38.9 million to $174.9 million. But the athletic footwear group is now facing fierce competition, most notably from Nike, which is now the world's most successful athletic gear company. Mr Fireman received 95 per cent of his past pay in bonuses but the company has now set a cap on these.

A recent study by the Harvard Business School showed that among the 250 largest US companies the chief executives own an average of only 0.7 per cent of the equity. This will increase because the leveraged buyout boom has given chiefs of the companies concerned an average 4 per cent equity in their companies, and options are increasingly paid to public company managers.

Troubled companies are also forcing senior staff to buy more shares in the company, to improve incentives and to help boost the company's share price.

Last year, he earned $9.6 million. The average chief executive salary in the US was $1.4 million, compared to $350,000 The US share market is pleased at the

The dismissal suggests Hungary is rethinking its ampitious privatisation programme, which involves the sale of 100 to 150 companies next year, aimed at raising between $1.3 billion and $1.9 billion.

Mr Tómpe's successor, Laios Csepi, an ex-vice president of the country's post office, is likely to slow the speed with which Hungary will privatise, because of the unpopularity of the Ibusz share flotation.

The main problem was that most Hungarians could not participate because they did not have sufficient savings to invest or, if they did, they did not know enough about shares The dismissal of István Tömpe, head of the and stock markets.

Ibusz was priced in such a way that the share buyers made an instant profit when the shares almost doubled in a few weeks. The beneficiaries were often wealthy ex-communists, for who capitalism now proves anything but painful, and foreign financial institutions, but not the average Hungarian, a situation which is politically unacceptable.

The chances of privatising 80 per cent of Hungary's stateowned assets within a few years, a wish once expressed by Mr Tompe, now appear slim. Economic reform will be a long-winded process, and it will wrongfoot many of those who believe that Eastern Europe will become the focus of industrial and economic

British-style privatisation of the 1980s cannot be a model for Eastern Europe. This will come as a disappointment not least to the City of London, whose merchant banks have been hoping to generate income from advising on privatisation issues, and investment funds, whose managers hope for above-average returns in Eastern Europe.

In the Britain of the early 1980s privatised companies could prosper once exposed to the disciplines of the free market. This option is not available in Eastern Europe, where there can be no purely domestic solution. Levels of skills may be comparable with Western European countries, but the quality of the management and the availability of yields, on say ten-year gilts, would be sustainable? The likelihood that Britain will join with wide bands, taken with the chancellor's statement last week that ERM "doesn't have the rigidity that some claim". clearly leaves open the possibility of significant fluctuations in the sterling exchange rate.

This behaviour is not too difficult to explain. For some time the market has been dominated by Britain's prospective entry into the exchange-rate mechanism of the European Monetary System rather than by domestic fundamentals.

If, upon ERM entry, sterling were to move near the top of its wide band, as seems possible, there would be scope for subsequent sizeable foreign exchange losses that could easily outweigh the existing yield differential in pants, possibly the most important factor determining expected currency movements over time within the

EMS is relative inflation differentials.

Within the EMS it may, therefore, be most relevant to compare real (inflation adjusted) bond yields across countries.

The real yields available on ERM bond markets vary between 6 and 7 per cent There is no good reason to believe the real yield in Britain, once in the ERM. will average much less than 6.5 per cent. Even on rosy atsumptions, the annual rate of inflation is unlikely to be much below 5 per cent. Thus at the brightest end of the spectrum, nominal gift yields might drop to 11.5 per cent.

T owever, there could also be prolonged periods after joining when disappointment sets in, with the market concluding that the counter-inflation discipline of the system was not working, and the possibility that a future Lab our government might devalue sterling within the parity grid.

At times like these, the market might conclude that core inflation was likely for remain at 6-7 per cent. Then the indicated gift yield would rise to 12-13 per cent.

Clearly, ERM entry still leaves scope for wide variations in gilt yields in re-sponse to changes in dismestic fundamentals. As for the next move in yields, it is possible that economic activity is on the verge of turning sharply down. Company results suggest trading conditions have become much more difficult in the last few months. Meanwhile, the marked decline in MO growth this month to an estimated 5.5 per cent suggests a further weakening in anti-uleer drugs was also made by a British scientist, James Black, but the product of his work (which also won a Nobel prize) was not Glaxo's Zantac, but Tagamet, produced and marketed by SmithKline.

Glaxo developed Zantac only after refocusing its research effort when Dr Black's results were published in 1972. Glaxo's product acts in a similar way to Tagamet, blocking the secretion of acid to allow ulcers to heal, and although Glaxo claimed that it had fewer side effects and could be taken with a twice-daily dose rather than a four-times-a-day dose, Zantac was not the breakthrough that Tagamet was. Whereas EMI was a technological leader, Glaxo was a technological follower.

When Glaxo launched Zantac in 1981, SmithKline has already been selling Tagamet for five years and had expanded the market from $90 million to $1.5 billion, making Tagamet the world's best-selling drug. To overcome its marketing weakness in most of the main markets where Zantac had to be sold, Glaxo entered into joint vent-ures, sometimes with several different firms in the same market, and priced Zantac sub-stantially higher than the competing product to signal its superiority. So successful was the strategy that Zantac captured 7 per cent of new prescriptions within a week of launching the product in America. Slow to mprove its own product, Smith-Kline gradually lost its market lead and the benefits of its innovation to Glaxo. EMI faced the same underlying problem as Glaxo of how to sell its product as a medium-sized British company in markets where it had little or no presence. Relying on its technological lead, it decided to set up its own manufacturing facilities and do its own marketing, concentrating on America. At first it was successful but as competitors such as Ohio Nuclear and General Electric entered the field with more resources, EMI began to suffer losses. It was subsequently taken over by Thorn, and the Cat scanner business was sold to GE. The question of why some companies fail and some succeed is one that well repays the application of economic disciplines. If only a quarter of the economic resources that the City squanders on trying to guess the next movement in interest rates were employed in trying to analyse business performance, the return to the economy would be a good deal higher.

A good starting point for an economics-based analysis of business performance is to try to define more closely what con-stitutes success or failure. None of the existing measures is wholly satisfactory. Return on capital cannot distinguish between capital intensive and labour intensive businesses. Banks and property companies which employ large amounts of capital will never make the same return on it as service companies which tend to employ relatively little. Equally, margin on turnover varies widely between the relatively high margins at the beginning of the production chain and the low ones among retailers. In any case, measuring margins begs the question of whether it is right to aim for a low turnover, high margin business or a turnover, low margin one.

Evan Davis and John Kay, in another article in the Review, describe a new measure which attempts to capture a firm's economic value. They calculate a firm's "added value" by deducting from operating profits a figure for the return which could be made elsewhere on operating assets. This is done by applying the long bond yield to tangible assets including stocks. Having identified the value to shareholders and the economy of employing assets in that particular firm rather than elsewhere in the economy, they then relate the added value to input costs, that is labour costs plus the capital charge on operating assets.

In a league table of the six leading supermarket groups in Britain Kwik Save comes out clear winner producing £1.25 for every £1 of inputs. Sainsbury is next with £1.10, while Asda produces only 98p for every £1 of inputs. Though identifying winners does not tell you what made them successful, a clearer vision of the economics of the firm and the appropriate corporate goals could help to produce more Glaxos and fewer EMIs.

California insurers face ruling

From PHILIP ROBINSON

IN LOS ANGELES

THE California insurance industry and its top state regulator, Roxani Gillespie, will face each other in court again today to hear the decision on whether she can begin demanding rebates for some of the state's 17 million motorists. But whatever the decision, by Los Angeles Superior Court

Judge Dzintra Janavas, the losing side is certain to appeal. California's 400 insurance companies are seeking to stop Ms Gillespie implementing the rebate provisions of insurance reforms known as proposition 103, which became law two years ago and seeks a 20 per cent cut in car premiums from November 1987 levels.

The split could widen when East Germany, whose entire territory will be eligible for EC regional aid, is absorbed into the community. A soft line on state subsidies could therefore make the GDR a doubly attractive location for investment by West Ger-

● CZECHOSLOVAKS may soon be eligible for £312 million worth of loans from the EC's development bank, following satisfaction in Brussels with their country's economic and political reform plans, according to Henning Christophersen, EC economic commissioner.

The loans would come from the European Investment Bank, which borrows on international capital markets and lends money for development projects. Mr Christophersen says Czechoslovakia must rapidly change its banking and price ing systems, tighten its monetary and fiscal management and privatise its state monopolies. BRUSSELS begins two days of talks at the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) in Paris today with the United States, Japan, South Korea and other shipbuilding countries to negotrate a phase-out of state subsidies to the world's shipyards. Some Asian firms boast an ability to compete without government money, but the EC wants a long enough grace period to allow European shipbuilders to streamline their operations before facing full competition. Brussels is also pushing for a procedure to settle disputes in order to dissuade competitors from taking the

CAPITA, the management services group, has bought itself out of a joint venture with British Telecom in a deal worth £1.3 million. This gives the group full control of Telecom Capita, which was set up with BT in October 1988. Telecom rapidly became one of Capita's most profitable divisions. Rod Aldridge, Capita chairman, said the agreement would increase earnings and bring greater stability to the group's income. "We look forward to the rapid development of Telecom Capita under our full control, whilst maintaining our strong links with British Telecom."

Paul Pindar, group finance director, said Capita had changed since coming to the market in April last year. From an original core business of management and systems consultancy the company has expanded to provide a wide range of management services.

Capita is one of the few management consultancy businesses to target the public sector. Mr Pindar said the company's aim was to line up a steady flow of business. "Our objective is to provide a wide range of management services to the public sector and to enhance the quality of our income by selling longer-term contracts. One way or another, we appear to have achieved it."

Telecom Capita won contracts worth £25 million last year. Its biggest deal so far, with Berkshire county council, will provide a steady flow of business over the next five years. The company is pursuing up to five further bids, and expects to announce more deals within the next three months.

Telecom Capita runs the poll tax billing system on behalf of several local Aldridge: maintaining links with BT on winning local government contracts is likely to stand Capita in good stead. The poll tax will provide a steady stream of business, while consultancy and training in general management and information technology will remain in demand.

Many councils need to upgrade their financial systems, and Capita can be expected to bid aggressively for contracts. Apart from advising on technology and computers, it can provide help with training, public relations, corporate finance and provision of temporary staff.

Capita made pre-tax profits of £1.3 million in the year to last December, and is expected to double that this year. A full listing is expected within 18 months.

Changing tack at Wensum WHEN Wensum joined the USM a year ago, the main objective of Andrew Hughes, the chairman, was to maximise all the benefits of a public listing in order to expand the company.

But he quickly discovered that the day-to-day running of a public company was a time-consuming operation that left him little time for other matters. He found that he was spreading himself too thinly and attracting criticism from some of his institutional shareholders, who were demanding greater expansion.

Mr Hughes has just strengthened Wensum's management with the appointment of a new commercial director, which will allow him more time to concentrate on the group's future.

The new incumbent, Philip Mitzman vill take over the day-to-day running of Wensum's clothing division, which designs and manufactures own-label men's quality suits, blazers and formal wear for leading high street retailers. He will be

Meanwhile, the group's other division, Wensum Corporate, specialising in designing, making and distributing corporate uniforms and career wear, is performing well. It supplies a number of blue chip clients, including Lloyds Bank, Air Canada, Ford Motor and the London

In its first year on the USM, Wensum lifted pre-tax profits 22 per cent to £635,000. The group last year signed a sizeable contract supplying WH Smith, and analysts are forecasting pre-tax profits of at least £750,000 for the current ear. Originally a management buyout Hornes, after it was bought by Sears, Wensum came to market via a placing of shares at 70p. On Friday they

Conflict over intent in assault cases

Before Lord Justice Mustill, Mr. Justice Waterhouse and Mr Justice Swinton Thomas (Judement July 20)

Court of Appeal decisions in R v Sprail (The Times May 14) and R v Savage (The Times May 18). on the degree of intent necessary to establish an offence of assault occasioning actual bodily harm under section 47 of the Offences against the Person Act 1861. were in conflict.

Their Lordships preferred the ,conclusion expressed in Spraut and held that the prosecution had to establish, as for the offence of unlawfully and maliciously wounding or inflicting gnevous bodily harm under section 20, that the accused intended to cause the particular kind of harm specified in the section or was reckless as to that ficient to establish that he had committed an assault which had

The state of the law in that area was unsatisfactory but beyond resolution by the Court of Appeal.

The Court of Appeal, in a reserved judgment, allowed the appeal of Philip Mark Parmenter against his convic-tion on February 22, 1989 in Chelmsford Crown Court (Judge Taylor and a jury) of four offences of inflicting grievous bodily harm contrary to section 20 of the 1861 Act, on which he was sentenced to a total of five

He had pleaded guilty to one offence of crucity to a person lo. contrary to section I(1) of the Children and Young was sentenced to 18 months imprisonment concurrent.

Mr Aftab Jafferjee, assigned by the Registrar of Criminal Appeals, for the appellant: Mr. Colin Woodford and Mr Richard Daniel for the Crown.

LORD JUSTICE MUSTILL said that all the counts on the indictment related to injuries caused to the appellant's baby The baby had suffered injuries to the bony structures of his legs appellant did not dispute that by rough handling on his part.

The only issue at the trial was whether the appellant had acted with the necessary intent, his case being that he had no experience with small babies and did not realise that handling which (as was accepted by a paediatrician at the trial) would not be inappropriate when handling a three to four year old child would be quite inappropriate with a new born baby.

On the crucial issue of intent the trial judge directed the jury. inter alia, that it was funnecessary that the accused should have foreseen that his unlawful act might cause physical harm" of the type described in the section. It was "enough that he should have foreseen that some physical harm to character, might result".

At first sight that direction unexceptionable. containing as it did a direct quotation from R v Monati [1968] 1 QB 421). Yet on closer inspection it could be seen to be lawed because by directing the iury by reference to only part of the passage in Mowall the judge had inadvertently imparted a fundamental change to the principle laid down there.

When the judgment in Monail was read as a whole it seemed clear that the court was stating two propositions, one

The positive proposition was convicted under section 20 unphysical harm to some other person would be the con-sequence of his act. That was subject to a negative qualifica-tion that the defendant need not actually have foreseen that th harm would be as grave as that

Their Lordships believed that in Monatt the words "should have foreseen" were intended to bear the same meaning as "did Read out of context, however, "should have" was "ought to

By reading the passage to the jurers in isolation from its context the judge thus advertently created a real risk that the jurors would believe that they were being directed to ask themselves, not whether the appellant actually foresaw that his acts would cause injury, but whether he ought to have fore-

That was an ambiguity which while there was a possibility that the jury might feel doubt about hether the appellant actually intended to injure the child there seemed on the evidence to have been little room for ques tion that, judged objectively, he what he did would lead to

There was thus an important misdirection. There could be no question of applying the profour counts under section 20 were therefore quashed.

Their Lordships then had to decide whether they could and should substitute for the convictions quashed alternative verdicts under section 47 of the 1861 Act. a course which could be taken only if, assuming in the appellant's favour that the injuries were foresceable but not actually foreseen, the necessary element of intent for that offence was present.

A curious situation had emerged because only a few days before the present appeal was heard, two divisions of the Court of Appeal had, by a remarkable coincidence, delivered judgment on the necessary intent for section 47 at precisely the same time, but had unfortunately reached opposite conclufollows:

1 The decision on the particular facts was that where the defen-dant did not intend to bring about any kind of physical contact with the complainant. and did not recognise that there was a risk of contact, the offence under section 47 was not made

2 The decision also esablished (or resterated in the light of R v l enna ([1976] QB 421) that so far as intent was concerned the as it was for section 20, that is, the R v Cunningham test ([1957] 2 QB 396), which required an intention to do "the particular kind of harm".

Although in Snott the court did not refer to Viouall their Lordships believed it had to follow that that expression had the same meaning for the pur-poses of section 47 as it was given in Monail for the purposes of section 20, that is, "any physical harm".

1 The decision on the particular facts was that where the defen-dant intended to do act A. amounting to an assault, and in the course of it unintentionally did act B. which caused the actual bodily harm of which the complaint was made, all the elements of an offence under section 47 were present 2 The case did not decide anything about the position where the defendant did not intend to make any contact with the complainant. It seemed to their Lordships those decisions were in conflict as to a case where there was some intention or reckless.

ness about the degree of contact necessary to make an assault. To decide the present case. their Lordships were obliged to resolve that conflict, and after careful consideration had to prefer Spratt, which was founded on a line of authority leading directly to the conclusion there expressed, whereas those authorities were not mentioned in Savage and could not have been brought to the attention of the court. Applying that conclusion to be present case, and acknowledging the limits of their powers under section 3 of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968. their Lordships had to consider whether, within the verdict of the tury, facts could be taken as established which proved the necessary degree of intent

Thus it had to be asked whether there was implicit in the verdict on section 20 given in the light of a direction terms of objective intent. a finding that the appellant subjectively intended or recgenised the risk of physical question to see that the answer was "No".

Accordingly, no verdicts of guilty under section 47 should substituted for the convictions which had been quashed. Some concluding remarks Their Lordships understood might be appropriate.

tences for offences under sections 20 and 47 were the same. nobody could doubt that the two offences were seen in quite different terms by defendants, their advisers and sentencing

Yet if the Cunningham subjective test combined with the low level of intent prescribed Mowatt was applied to section 47 in the same way as to section 20, the moral overtones of the two offences became indistinguishable and the differences between the two depended upon variations between the levels of physical injury suffered in the individual which might often be the result of chance.

Second, it was impossible to without dismay. At a time when "middle-rank" criminal vi-"middle-rank" criminal vi-olence was a dismal feature of modern urban life, and when convictions and pleas of guilty on charges under section 4 occurred so much of crown court lists, it seemed scarcely credible that 129 years after the enactment of the Offences against the Person Act three Court of Appeal which revealed the law to be so impenetrable. Their Lordships believed that he authorities could no longer live together and that the reason ideas, logically and morally sustainable in themselves, but mutually inconsistent, about whether the unforeseen consequences of a wrongful act the intent (Cunningham) or the consequences (Mowait).

Until the whole matter had been reviewed by a higher court, their Lordships could do no better than to suggest to trial udges that subjective intent and subjective appreciation of the risk were the touchstones for which the jury should look, and that for so long as Mowall remained the law the possibility of any physical harm was what the jury, when assessing that subjective element, should be invited to consider.

Their Lordships did not disguise their opinion that the law so stated would in marginal cases be as unworkable in practice as it was objectionable in theory. They could do nothing about that. Only the House of Lords could now put the subject on an even keel.

His Lordship did not understand how that could possibly be so. If a ballot were on who the union should take industrial action, the count of votes for and against could not alone determine the outcome; only the rules could determine whether a simple majority or something more was required for an affir-

For some purposes therefore, reference to the rules was esse tial and once it was accepted that the result of a bare count of votes could not determine the result without such reference, his Lordship could not see any reason why a rule limiting the number of seats to which carrdidates in a particular category might be elected should be treated as offending against section 2(8)(b) or regulation

It was clearly permissible for a union by its rules to prescribe qualifications for candidates, subject to section 2(9) of the 1984 Act which provided that no member should be unreasonably excluded from standing as a candidate. If it were discovered after a ballot that one of the candidates had not been qualified to stand under the rules, the rule disqualifying him would prevail, notwithstanding that he had been top of the ballot

Neither that rule, nor the rule in this case which had automatically disqualified candidates from the North East Division once the places available to members from that division h been filled, involved any breach of section 2(8)(b) or regulation qualifying members from election on the ground of their political beliefs would contravene the express prohibition in section 2(9), and the count would certainly not permit a union to evade that prohibition by the device of expressing the disqualification as taking effect after election rather than at the Stage when the candidate stood election; there was no need to look to section 2(8)(b) to provide a safeguard against that

All that section 2(8)(b) and regulation 11(/) were intended to secure was that the only votes which would determine the outcome of a ballot were these directly cast by the individual members voting. The mischiel to which they were directed was that involved in any system of weighted voting block voting or voting through the medium of an electoral college.

His Lordship was relieved to find that the House was not constrained by the language of the provisions to reach an unreasonable result which the egislature could not sensibly. have intended. The certification officer construction would not only deprive the union of its right to reimbursement but would lay the election itself open to chall-enge under section 5 of the 1984:

If the union were to be ordered under that section to-hold a fresh election, his Lordship was at a loss to undertstand how the terms of the order could be framed to ensure that that election complied with the sug-gested restriction and at the ne time that candidates from any one division should not be permitted to dominate the NEC. Possible shortened life expectancy of an offender who was positive was, in the absence of medical evidence, no basis for mitigating his sentence.

Lord Lane, Lord Chief Justhree months and two and a half tice, so stated when giving the ing an appeal by Archibald James Burke Moore, aged 37, of Mackenzie Road, Holloway, London, against a sentence of five years imprisonment concurrent passed by Judge Griffiths at Maidstone Crown Court on pleas of guilty to two counts of burglary with three offences taken

Mr Nigel Van der Bijl, assigned by the Registrar of Criminal Appeals, for the appellant.

The . LORD . CHIEF JUSITCE, said that counsel had cited R v Rees (unreported, CA, August 10, 1988), an appeal by an offender who had been sentenced to seven years imprisonment and was HIV positive. Medical evidence there was that knowledge of the condition was limited and that his life expectancy was between to three years. in giving the judgment of the court in that case Mr Justice French said that the court had never shrunk in appropriate cases from exercising mercy. The sentence was reduced to four years. The Lord Chief Justice said that in the present case there was no such medical evidence. It was suggested that, from what the appellant himself had said, his life expectancy might be-diminished. Their Lordships did not consider it to be the function of their court to base their decision on such possible medical considerations. They did not know (i) what the future might hold, (ii) what it might hold with regard to medical expertise, (iii) and with regard to the perticular, appellant

If the time should come when it was no longer possible for practical reasons or reasons of humanity to hold him in prison because of his physical condition, then that was the job of the Home Office who had at least two methods by which they could take action in such could take action in circumstances, as their bordeships court had reason to said from past experience.

If such a situation arose mathemas, the proper method: Ala dealing with it. The burglaries were highly sophisticated five years was not too long and the appear was dismissed.

Skinner cages raging Pumas

From David Hands, RUGBY CORRESPONDENT, BUENOS AIRES

ENGLAND'S porous defence four games before Saturday's first international with Argentina at the Vélez Sarsfield Stadium here. But the Pumas found, quite unexpectedly as Rudolfo O'Reilly, their coach, dmitted, that at last England had built a wall before their try-line which could not be breached — at least, not by the team that Argentina put into

O'Reilly hinted that he expects no change for the second international next Saturday, save for the possibility of Diego Cash returning to the front row. Should that be the case, his team gives all the indication of trying to play to a game plan which it is not capable of pursuing, of trying to play fast and loose with a back division with insufficient pace supported by a back row increasingly committed to shoring up an ageing tight five.

It was not a game to write home about - if you take the meaning - but in the context of this tour it was a notable England triumph by a goal, a try and five penalty goals to four penalties. It was underpinned by Hodgkinson's ex-cellent goal-kicking as the Argentine forwards discovered that offside habits they are largely permitted by their own referees are not highly favoured by officials from elsewhere - in this case Brian Kinsey from Australia, who may have overlooked sundry acts of violence during the game but at least gave both sides the chance to develop areas of play which England have found incredibly difficult

and then caught a cold.

Pures power: Carling, the England captain, with Winterbottom (left) and Hodekinson in support, is tackled by Vidou, the Argentine right wing

If there was a period when this tour, despite many disappointments in the first fortmatch what has otherwise been an indifferent tour. Carling, England's captain, who took a not dissimilar decision in the Calcutta Cup match last March, remarked (tongue in cheek, I think) that Loffreda obviously wanted to keep the pressure on. But it was a mistake which, allied to Loffreda's indifferent play from centre, suggests that his long tenure in the national side (this was his 34th international) may be drawing to a close. As it was, England finally broke clear and Hodgkinson was able to kick his fifth penalty for an invaluable match tally of 17 points. Since he was also resolutely firm in defence, the Nottingham full back had a thoroughly good day in a stadium containing a crowd of some 30,000 and hardly three-quarters full. None the less England's appearance was warmly acclaimed and the national anthem, played despite advice from some quarters to the contrary, was applauded in a way which magnificent tackling led, it indicated a popular desire to should be emphasised, by mend the severed ties of the Skinner, who redeemed in one past decade. that they were the stronger England's half-time lead of 13-9 contained the first of their two tries of a match in which, for the first time on tour, they were never headed. Playing down a blustery wind but in the dry conditions which they have come to expect, Hodgkinson and Video matched each other as Vidou matched each other at goal-kicking (only one place-kick at goal was missed all afternoon) and the difference was Ryan's try. It was a good first international appearance by the Wasps No 8 and his score was simplicity itself, Hill running wide from a fivemetre scrum and slipping the bell back to Ryan, who crossed unicorried.

England's lineout took longer than expected to get into the game, partly because much of the early throwing in was done by Argentina to the large but lumbering lachetti, But by the end England, had obtained a modest advantage and Redman, in his first international for two years, was outstanding in the loose. England's scrum discovered combination, which led to aggreed frustration by the Pumas forwards; Probyn sufconceded three points for retaliation but the blood which stained Moore's shirt for much of the second half was from a wounded oppo-

Two of the other new caps, Leonard and Heslop, could be pleased with their games and Pears, at stand-off half, had his best match of the tour without ever threatening cither to advance his threequarters' cause or to break the Argentine line himself. In that respect England had to play a limited game but, as Geoff Cooke, the manager, admitted: "It was very important to us to win today and, to a certain extent, style went out of the window and it was a question of pride and commitment. We still have a tendency to suicidal error which we have to work to eliminate."

Cooke applauded the play of Gómez, the Argentine scrum half, who was a constant menace in broken play, and it must have been with great relief that the England party saw Scolni, the Argentine full back absent for the last two months because of suspension, put Garretón into grave difficulty in defence. The flanker was caught and robbed, leaving Carling to give Oti room for the only time in the match to run clear to the corner for his eighth inter-national try. Hodgkinson's magnificent touchline conversion, across the wind, aided the new sense of self-belief with which the touring team will complete the final week. SCORERS: Argentine: Penelty go: Viccu (4). Andries boxes the ears of the experts with the old 1-2-3

DENNIS Andries, the man the experts said would never win the world title, earned himself a unique position in the record books by becoming the first Briton to become champion of the world three times on Saturday.

The Guyana-born Loudoner knocked out Jeff Harding, of Anstralia, in the seventh round to regain the World Boxing Council light-heavyweight title that the Australian had taken from him 13 months ago in Atlantic City.

In that first encounter it seemed that Andries's 35 years had at last caught up with him. For after not losing a round to Harding he suddenly faded in the last round and was stopped. His career seemed over, just as it.

His career seemed over, just as it had done after Thomas Hearns had relieved him of his title and left him in a heap on the floor of the Cobo Arena, Detroit two years earlier. It was a remarkable achie-

ment for the old man of British boxing. The experts had greeted every step of his progress throughout his 12-year career with incredulity, even when he outpointed J. B. Williamson to lift the title for the first time in 1986. They did not believe that the man who had been beaten by Bunny Johnson in 1979 and 1980 and Tom Collins in 1982, stopped by David Pearce in ment for the old man of British 1980 and 10m Collins in 1982, stopped by David Pearce in 1981, floored by Alex Blanchard in 1985, demolished by Thomas Hearns in 1987 and left floundering by Harding could

They had not reckoned on the determination of the man who, after being knocked out by Hearns, the hero of the Kronk, Hearns, the nero of the Kronk, went straight back to the director of that fearsome gym, Emmanuel Steward, and asked him turn him into a fighter. Steward smoothed out the rough edges and shortened his punches and turned him into The Rock. Andries remained steadfast in bis belief in himself. He blumed his failure against Harding on his diet, gathered himself and came back for more. The odds were heavily against him in Melbourne. After trailing Harding for six rounds, he pinned him on the ropes in the seventh and never stopped throwing punches till a big right dropped the Australian.

munches till a big right dropped the Australian.

"You can hit me with rocks, you can hit me with sticks, you can hit me with stoks, you can hit me with stoks, you can hit me with stoks, loame to take it and come back. I carne to his backyard and did a demolition job. I didn't care how many punches I took. It was pay-back time". Andries said after doing his victory back-flip. Harding's trainer. Manny Hinton, thought his man would have won if he managed to weather the seventh. "I thought he was home and hosed. I think if we could have got through the seventh. Andries would have been easy meat, because my bloke would have freshened up quicker, because he's younger." bloke would have freshened up quicker because he's younger."
Andries wants to put on a show for his following in Britain. "We will put on a show in England because the people deserve it," he said. "It would be fantastic to defead my title in Britain, hopefully by the end of the year. It would be a nice Christmas present for everybody.

Goodwill Games outgrow their original motive and blossom into an exercise in international relations

Party goes with a swing even with VIPs missing

ATHLETICS CORRESPONDENT, SEATTLE

THE announcer in the King County Aquatics Center had lost his self-control. "Ladies and gentlemen, please don't sit down. Stamp your feet, holler, wave, anything you can Let her know anything you can. Let her know you're here. We can get a world record." And they did, but Janet Evans did not. The 1,500 metres freestyle record, Evans's own record, stayed where it was.

Some of the main guests have not shown up, but the Goodwill Games party is going with a swing. Even in the athletics stadium, where gold medals were often cheaper than victories in the British league, you could not hear your popeora crunch. "I watched World Cup soccer on TV, but it has nothing on this," one of the 14,000 Games volunteers said, as if Roger Kingdom's victory over Tony Dees was the achievement of a lifetime

Last Wednesday it was discov-

name on a long list of withdrawals from athletics: Christie, Jackson, Cram, Bubka, Harris, Moses, Bile, Ottey, Melinte, Chistyakova, to name but a few. But there are 21 sports here and the organisers are claiming that 19 have fulfilled their promise of "a multi-sport invitational uniting the best in the world". Swimming, missing only a handful, including Britain's Adrian Moorhouse, can be noted as a good effort in attracting the world's best, athletics as the only failure. The Goodwill Games are aiming at Olympic standard but fewer than half the athletics gold medals were won by competitors who would be considered potential Olympic champions. Yet The Athletics Congress, justifiably claiming that competition in many events has been exciting, even if standards have been moderate, has welcomed the shop window of a substantial share of the 86 hours of primetime cable television which the Goodwill Games are getting in the United States. "The Goodwill Games have helped a great deal with the promotion of track and field in the United States, and I think we will continue to feel an impact," Ollan Cassell, the president of TAC, said.

Apart from the Penn relays, for which attendance is high because parents are attracted to support their children, the average crowd of 23,000 is the highest for the sport in the United States since the Los Angeles Olympics of 1984. Both Leroy Burrell and Michael Johnson, the respective winners of the 100 and 200 metres and among the few winners here who would be regarded as potential Olympic champions, said the Goodwill Games had been the highlight of their careers.

Neither has been at the top long enough to experience Olympic or world championship competition. While the British have European championships and Common wealth Games this year, the Americans would have had nothing but for the Goodwill Games. "We wanted to give our athletes that feeling this year," Cassell said. Paul Beckham, the president of the Games, said the feeling would probably return every four years for a long time to come. The reason for inventing the Goodwill Games, first held in 1986, was to raise the iron curtain between American and Soviet sport after the Olympic boycotts of 1980 and 1984. The motive is now outdated but Ted Turner, the television to relations between the countries. "International relationships are like a marriage - you have to work at them" is the message which Turner has been getting across here. Which is one reason why Turner Broadcasting System (TBS) is not rushing into divorce proceedings. The other reason is time. As Beckham said: "The question being asked is what in the world are you doing it for if you're losing money?" Keep feeding the slot machine and the jackpot will come? "I don't think these Games will lose money forever," Turner said. "Whenever you start an enterprise, you don't usually cover your expenses at the

When Turner started CNN, an all-news network, in 1980, tens of millions of pounds were lost during the first five years. "Now it's making hundreds of millions of dollars," Beckham said. In 1985 Turner bought the MGM library. "According to some, it was an astronomically stupid sum. But it was able to provide enough material to start TNT (Turner Net-work Television) and six months after it was launched, at a cost of $10 million, it was valued at $750

"So far as the Goodwill Games Losses in 1986 were $26 million and may be as high again this is not that large. We had a board spoke out against these Games. We have to consider what is happening in the field of rights payments. We paid $275 million for the right to NBA basketball for four years. We paid $445 million for four years of NFL football. We paid $8 million for a little bit of World Cup soccer and viewer interest in the Goodwill Games is

The reception here has been reminiscent of the Common-wealth Games in Auckland in January, friendly and enthusiastic. Ratings have increased daily and the signal has been taken by 70 countries. "We own this thing and if a bit of life is breathed into it we have a major success here," Beck-ham added. "I am disappointed that Britain is not here, but this event will get through to them."

It has already got through to the rowers, who sent 30 of the 50 British participants in the Games. But Britain was represented in only eight sports. "We are talking about Olympic sports here," Turner said. "And they are only on the global stage once every four years. That made sense back in the 1930s when it took two months to take a steamship to arrive. There is no reason why there is not room in the athletics calendar for an event like this."

Not all is goodwill, however Alberto Juantorena, the 1976 Olympic 400 and 800 metres champion, is here looking after the Cubans, but was upset that the United States government refused to allow the head of the 1991 Pan-American Games host committee to attend.

Yuri Korolev, the vice-president of the Soviet Ice Hockey Federation, was left wondering the same. The Soviet Union's player, Sergei Fedorov, used his trip to the Games to sign a five-year contract with the Detroit Red Wings. "They stole our player," Korolev said. "Having this happen is like a spoon of tar in a barrel of honey."

Early start pays well for Rollings

SURFACE 30-knot winds and bad weather from the west led to the field's withdrawal in the Open national gliding cham-pionships at Lasham yesterday. Only the regional A-class attempted the rare task of a one-way goal race to Swanton Morley, Norfolk, but many landed early near the one turn-ing point at Didcot, devaluing the scoring.

The Open thus starts today

Two cloud climbs to 6,000 feet and 4,500 feet at Swindon and Oakley brought him home 17.2 kilometres per bour faster than May in second place, while most other pilots had to divert to the west to stay airborne. of the Soviet Union, 7-6, 6-2, in the first rubber of the Federation Cup final, Jennifer Caprial maintained her unbeaten record in the competition. The outcome of the match was never really in doubt, although one wished the players could have reached a conclusion by a less tortuous route. The contest was often mediocre, and even the American team-led attempt at the "wave" received only a luke-warm response from the less-than-capacity crowd. Perhaps their lack of enthusiasm also had a little to do with the conditions, for it was not and undoubtedly uncomfortable for the players. Capriati and Meshki might, then, have been excused for inconsistency and an often ragged performance. Capriati made her customary slow start, losing her serve in the opening game, and although she broken again in the next game, to love. Only after the American had recovered that break in the eighth game did she begin to demonstrate her true colours. becoming more aggressive and running rather better.

She needed to move well, for Meshki's most successful tactic was in running Capriati around. She found excellent angles, and drew her best results by pulling the American wide on her backband. Meskhi was often caught out of position herself, a victim of Capnati's speed and fine hand skills. But with the match consisting largely of unspectacular cross-court forchands and double-handed backhand rallies there was little to get excited about.

Capriati led 5-4 and 40-0 on Meskhi's serve but lost that chance and had to be content with taking the set in the tic-break. The writing was on the wall when she broke serve in the opening game of the next set, and Meshki was left to play catch-up in vain.

Belmez and Old Vic give Cecil memorable one-two in King George at Ascot

Hamlet without the princess

THE stirring battle for the King George VI and Queen Elizabeth Diamond Stakes at Ascot on Saturday, in which Belmez and Old Vic gave Henry Cecil a memorable onetwo, remains in the mind as a performance of Hamlet with-out the prince, or, more appropriately, the princess.

Although Beimez clearly improved considerably on his third to Salsabil in the Irish Derby, it is a fact that Sheikh Hamdan Al-Maktoum's triple classic winner had been 4½ lengths to the good that day. "The form book is there for all to see," was the sole post-race observation of John Dunlop, Salsabil's trainer. This is a delicate matter. He who pays the piper is entitled to call the tune, and Sheikh Hamdan has been building a deserved reputation of mak-ing the right decision. But the trainer is surely the best judge of when a horse is entitled to run. Sheikh Mohammed allowed Henry Cecil to have his own way with Old Vic on Saturday, and the result speaks for itself.

Sheikh Hamdan's desire not to risk Salşabil on firm ground and keep her for an autumn campaign is fine in theory. But Salsabil has been in hard training since before the Fred Darling Stakes at Newbury in the spring and was still in hard training when withdrawn from the King George on Friday morning. The Prix de l'Arc de Triomphe and the Champion Stakes are still over two months away, plenty of time for a horse to go wrong. The moment to strike was surely on Saturday while the filly was at the peak of her summer bloom.

However, even at her best Salsabii would have had her work cut out against Belmez and Old Vic. As the pair fought out their spectacular duel, with Assatis struggling in vain to get to grips and horses of the calibre of Cacoethes, In The Wings and Terimon looking jaded and falling out of contention, there was a powerful impression that here was the most competitive championship race of the season so Epsom beaten Terimon in the Eclipse, so the three-year-old Belmez group in the field, shown a tendency to hang in Belmez's victory proved that generally prevails in this ultimate test of the generations. Henry Cecil's ranking as one of the great trainers of Turf history received further endorsement with his patient handling of the first two home. Never has his genius been more apparent than in his training of Belmez after his injury and of restoring Old Vic

Beimez, a home-bred son of El Gran Senor, had beaten the subsequent Derby winner Quest For Fame at Chester before bruising himself badly and being forced to miss

'He'd been in his box for nearly a month and needed the race at the Curragh," said Cecil. "But I knew he was beat the four-year-old Old Vic. cherry-ripe today. We put a Although the only one of his pricker on him because he'd Ireland. He'll be even better on the left-handed track. He's not in the St Leger but we might send him to York for the Great Voltigeur before his autumn campaign." Michael Kinane, having already won the Arc and the 2.000 Guineas on his first mount in those races, was repeating the feat on Belmez. A particularly strong and effective rider, Kinane's fine tactical sense is always at its best on the great occasion. "Belmez started to wander a bit under pressure, but he's very tough and very game,' said the rider.

Old Vic has certainly re-aptured the ability which saw him win the French and Irish Derbys and also be rated the best middle-distance threeyear-old in Europe last year.

"Sheikh Mohammed wasn't very keen to run, but he left it looks a natural for the race up to me," said Cecil. "It was a again this year, "He'll probbit of a risk as Old Vic's ably go for the Gooffrey Free! at Newbury next" said Guy hasn't been easy getting him ready on the all-weather, as the only time he's been on Harwood, Cacoethes, Assaus's stable companion and the more strongly fancied of the pair, once again looked dan-gerous early in the straight but grass was in his two racecourse gallops. But we'd come this far, so we had to try and run. his run only appeared to last We had to get his adrenalingoing if we want to run him in for about a furlong. "He needed that run," said the trainer. "We're going to run him in the International at the Arc and the Breeders' Cup.

If all goes well, he will be formidable in those races." Despite meeting with his Both In the Wings and Terimon were well and truly first defeat at Ascot, Assatis outpaced in the closing stages, as was the strongly functed turned in the best effort of his life in finishing third, only one and a half lengths behind Old Sapience. However, the York-Vic. However, Masato Shi-bata, his Japanese jockey, was shire challenger lost both his front shoes in Swinley Bottom. NEWCASTLE's imaginative scheduling of a group race on a Monday, traditionally the weakest racing day, has again reaped its due reward with an intriguing contest.

The Federation Brewery Classic Lager Beeswing Stakes is one of that relatively rare breed of race which caters for high-class seven furlong horses, so form at that distance needs to be the prime consideration.

With that in mind, Bold Russian has excellent credentials. He has improved throughout the season, winning handicaps at Newmarket. over this trip, and then over a mile at the Curragh.

However, the performance which underlines his chance here is his fine head second to Sally Rous in the seven-furlong Jersey Stakes, also a group three race, at Royal Ascot last month. He was not helped by having to be switched to challenge two furlongs out, although it is arguable whether that manoeuvre made the difference between victory and defeat.

On that run he holds Robellation, who was well behind in eighth and reopposes on the same terms. Phountzi and Montendre are likely to pose more potent threats, although both have questions to answer.

Phountzi, highly regarded by his stable, has been lightly Markofdistinction in a group Reform at Edinburgh last two race at Sandown in April month and then may have

Montendre has done more racing but connections seem undecided about his best trip. After a good second to Rock City in the Greenham Stakes over today's distance, he twice ran over six furlongs, on the second occasion making late progress to finish 2½ lengths fourth to Polar Bird at Newmarket However, Barry Hills. who trains both Bold Russian and Polar Bird, should have a clear idea of where he stands

Beverley beyond him when eighth to Batzushka. Pusey Street Boy, also a distance winner, is preferred as the danger to Military Shot, who is not easy to place despite some good form of his own over seven furlongs.

Whatever the fate of Pusey Street Boy, Richard Hannon should not leave the meeting empty-handed as Rapid Coracle has a clear-cut chance in the Federation Brewery Pale Ale Maiden Auction Stakes. He was an enouraging fifth to the useful Aimaam at Salisbury last month and has less to

At Lingfield, Rasan can record his fourth win in five starts in the Personnel Selection Handicap. He made all under top weight to win easily over this course and distance nine days ago and he is difficult to oppose while he remains in such good heart.

Ghadbbaan will have few better opportunities than in the Steels Selling Stakes, while Lear Leader (2.0) and Yala-noura (3.0) should justify likely short-priced favour-However, for the nap I turn

He was an encouraging running-on 1 1/2 lengths third to Saturday's Newcastle winner Tiber Flow at Sandown earlier this month, and the step up in distance, coupled with less demanding opposition, sug-gests he has fine prospects of gaining his first success.

Turfkonig was pushed through a gap on the rails by Georg Bocksai well over a furlong out, and the combination stayed on well to hold Dashing Blade a length, with Treble Eight a neck further behind in the group one race. British profit from Kostroma earns Nassau tilt

Montefiore and Kostroma in a awaiting the outcome of such cases. Jim Bolger continues to run three-way photo finish.

Polly Stakes.

That appeal has yet to be heard and according to rule

an effortless 11/2-length winner from Guy Harwood's Akamantis in the EBF Orby Stakes at Leopardstown on Saturday, and the winning trainer Tommy Stack now intends sending her to Goodwood on Saturday for the Nassau Stakes. The previous Saturday, Monteficie had won the Golden Pages Handicap here, but there is now argument that Caerless Writing should be disqualified from the Bicentenary Handicap. The reason for this is that the handicapper, who had raised her 13lb in other handicaps of this type, had neglected to give her a penalty at the Curragh, although an appeal had been lodged on her behalf against Clive Brittain's Game Plan, the winner of the Sea World Pretty Polly Stakes.

Stephen Craine looked back over his shoulder three times in the last furlong at non-existent dangers before he finally relaxed his reins and allowed Kostroma to strike the front.

LeMond is not missed as Bugno goes top

By Peter Bryan

THE absence of Greg LeMond from yesterday's Wincanton Classic at Brighton disappointed thousands of his supporters. The winner of the Tour de France pulled out as his team settled into their seafront hotel. reluctant to aggravate painful

But the race lost little, if any, excitement, from his absence, as Gianno Bugno, the winner of the Giro d'Italia. rode to victory in the classic manner along the packed scafront of Madeira

Drive at the south-coast resort. For the slightly-built Italian, it was a double celebration as the victory lifted him from second place into a clear lead in the Perrier world cup, a series of 13 international races of which yesterday's was the sixth.

yesterday's was the sixth.

Before the race, Bugno said that although he was mentally tired, he felt strong, as he was to prove six hours and 148 miles later. Nine riders had been "allowed" to keep the lead for the first four 32-mile circuits, which included Ditchling Beacon, and the fifth a smaller. con, and the fifth, a smaller circuit of five miles within Brighton's boundaries.

When these fugitives were caught about 10 miles from the finish, there was a flurry of attacks by riders seeking to escape the main pack of 50.

None lasted until Bugno attacked on the last hill with a force that took him 100 metres along only Bught Dhappers, the lear. Only Rudy Dhaenens, the Belgian team colleague of Sean Kelly, the Irishman, was strong enough to give immediate As Dhaenens faded, Kelly, the gave chase, pushed through in pursuit. But soon the race was over, as Bugno allowed himself the luxury of coasting over the line unchallenged, arms aloft, with Kelly leading a mass of riders 13 seconds later.

"I was amazed how easy it seemed to get clear," said Bugno. "I had been watching Bugno. "I had been watching Dhaenens because he was a threat to my second position in the world cup." The Italian has gone six points clear from Dhaenens, who found sufficient strength to close up and finish third. Kelly's second place was his best finish since he broke a collar bone lest sesson

Selection problems for Dailey

IN SEPTEMBER the world cycling championships will be mark its emergence as a world power in cycling (a Special Correspondent writes). There will be an emphasis on track sprinting but Britain's small team, limited by cost, may not be represented in this discipline Stewart Brydon (City of Edinburgh) has embarrassed Doug Dailey, the national coach, by speint championship at the Leicester track, but also by twice covering the last 200 metres in less than 11 seconds, which is potential world-class speed. Four non-sprinters have been pre-selected for Japan and Dailey now has to decide whether he can afford to take

The return to racing after a major operation by Chris Boardman, the silver medallist in the pursuit, also sends Dailey into contemplation, while Lou-ise Jones (GS Strada), the Commonwealth Games champion, is another sprinter to present selection problems. At Leicester Jones concentrated on the sprint. Now Dailey has to decide whether Jones should be selected for Japan for the sprint only, or the points race. In the non-championship pro-am raily cycles GP 30-kilometre race spectators treated to a race-long battle that decimated the field, with pro-fessional Paul Curran showing track ability to take the £500 first prize.

• After 33 hours in the saddle

Pauline Strong, the former British cycling international, was well placed last night to set a new record for riding non-stop from Land's End to John O'Groats. By 5pm last night she had side 542 willer and years 21 had riden 543 miles and was 21 miles south of Edinburgh.

So, having satisfied Leslie Shannon, their captain, by winning both series of foursomes 2-1, the Americans were thinking of their first Cup win since 1984. They needed only one-and-a-points, whereas the holders needed five-and-a-half, a remote prospect. Less remote, but still unlikely, were the five points needed to tie, and retain the trophy, à la Ryder Cup.

On the whole, on the first day. GB and I, with the shining exceptions of Julie Hall, the British champion. and Vicki Thomas, the Welsh veteran playing in her fifth consecutive Curis Cup, did themselves no justice. The greens were faster than they had been in practice and the visitors' scoring suffered, in both foursomes and singles.

Hall, who unfortunately was not feeling fully fit yes-terday, won both her matches on Saturday and looked an exceptional player. Thomas came back from three down after six to beat Carol Thompson, another veteran, on the 18th, but it was the Americans

Her decision was not helped by Hall's discomfort and, in fact, she and Kathryn Imrie were beaten only on the 17th by the classic youth-and-experience pairing of Vicki Goetze, aged 17, and Anne Sander, aged 52. Sander's is a brittle temperament but her partner's initials might as well stand for Very Good, for the young Georgian was the calming influence and made few mistakes. They were one over par when the match ended, not bad scoring for foursomes.

The second match, however, was outstanding. Karen Noble and Margaret Platt, the local heroines, must have been shell-shocked in the extreme when they went into lunch and realised they had had six birdies, were two under par and had still lost. Helen Dobson and Catriona Lambert, the Anglo-Scottish pairing that had crumbled to nine over par against Goetze and Sander on Saturday, did them-selves more than justice yesterday. There was never more than one hole in the match and the visitors were one up playing the 17th. They dropped a shot there, when Dobson mishit the second shot, but Platt's 18th, but it was the Americans who had drawn up the battle-lines and were on the attack, second was only five feet from the hole and Noble rolled in the birdie putt anyway.

Followed by a large, colour-ful, hot crowd, Dobson played first to the 18th green and hit a superb shot to 10 feet. Noble put hers pin high to 20 feet and there was muted applause and and Noble studied and conferred and a rather tall photographer took his post on the some rather shorter members of the women's committee of the United States Golf

McAllister proves early-season form

From a Special Correspondent in Kennemer

STEPHEN McAllister showed his appetite for links golf by speeding to victory in the KLM Dutch Open at Kennemer near Zandvoort yesterday — his sec-Zandvoort yesterday — his sec-ond win of the season. The Scot's first success, in a seven-way play-off for the Atlantic Open in February, may have had fortuitous overtones, but achieved in a thoroughly convincing style.

McAllister led from start to finish for a four-stroke margin over Roger Chapman, of England, who was beaten in a play-off for this title last year by José-Maria Olazábal, who, in taking third place, was the only other third place, was the only other player to better par.

McAllister, aged 27, from Paisley, doubled his earnings this year by lifting a £58,330 prize and joined Ian Woosnam, Olazabai and Rodger Davis, of Australia, among the select ranks of multiple 1990 champions.

A final round of 70, in which he had only two brief moments of alarm, provided an impres-sive defence against attack from the chasing pack, and even the mecurial Olazábal could not get close enough to exert pressure

The Spaniard needed early birdies to erase his four-stroke overnight deficit but his plans were thrown into immediate disarray. His first tee shot plunged his ball into a bush and he had to take a penalty shot. Then the putter with which he had been at odds for the first three rounds let him down again at the long second, which he three putted after getting home in two blows. Birdie putts also escaped on the next three greens. Although Olazábal did make inroads at the 10th and 12th, another drive into gorse, another penalty shot, and a further three putts at the 14th signalled his surrender.

McAllister's only concern came from Chapman, on the trail of his first European win. The former Walford Cup golfer had birdied two of the first three holes, striking a glorious mid-iron within inches of the first flag. Despite six at the 5th, where he was also in bushes, he turned only two strokes behind.

GARY Player succeeded where others succumbed, by overcoming wretched con-ditions to win the Volvo Seniors British Open with a final round of 75 on the Ailsa course at Turnberry.

Nannini's gamble makes Senna work for victory

AYRTON Senna yesterday scored his third consecutive scored his third consecutive victory in the German grand prix to move back to the top of the world championship table, four points clear of Alain Prost. With Gerhard Berger finishing in third place, it was a good afternoon's work by the Honda Mariboro McLaren team.

Senna's was not the easy victory that many people had been predicting. The thorn in the side of the McLaren attack was Alessandro Nannini, whose Benetton-Ford led for the middle third of the race, the team having gambled on using the harder of the two tyre choices offered by Goodyear and hoping offered by Goodyear and hoping to run through non-stop. The strategy worked perfectly, and although Nannini's tyres deteriorated considerably during the last 10 of the 45 laps, he held off Berger's attack all the way to the chequered flag. But it was a close call, for the engine which had served him so well which had served him so well (Senna said that at one time the Benetton was actually pulling away from the McLaren on the straights) finally expired just as he crossed the finishing line.

Prost had to settle for a distant fourth in a Ferrari that faded during the second half, having pushed the McLarens hard for the first 15 laps. Slightly off the pace, the Canon Williams-Renaults of Riccardo Patrese and Thierry Boutsen, which finished fifth and sixth, were the last of the 11 classified were the last of the 11 classified cars to complete the distance.
Like all the Goodyear-tyred teams apart from Benetton and Leyton House, McLaren and Ferrari opted for the softer Ccompound tyres and Berger, Prost and Nigel Mansell, run-

Senna making his change two laps At this point, Nannini had passed Patrese to move into what was expected to be a short-lived lead. But when Senna rejoined the race as Nannini went by he soon realised he had a hard fight ahead of him.

I THINK the most positive comment I can make after this race is: roll on the next one.

A place on the podium was definitely on the cards but I have been in that position many times this season and finished the day with nothing to show for it. Three finishes from nine grands prix tell their own story. I was perfectly happy with the way things were going in the early laps yesterday. I was running fourth, behind Ayrton Senna, Gerhard Berger and Alain Prost, and the car was

and there was quite a bit of debris about, so perhaps that was the cause. I did not pay too much attention to it at the time and on reflection I probably should have.

The effect was that I had a Ferrari with terrific understeer and that, of course, can be bad news. At the Ostkurve I found myself running up and over the kerb. My car was simply undrivable and I had to accept my race was over. All I could do

Gavaskar rejects MCC life membership offer

By QAMAR AHMED

SUNIL Gavaskar, the former Indian Test captain, has refused honorary life membership of MCC in a protest against discrimination at Lord's, Gavaskar, aged 41, the holder of the record for playing in most Test matches (125), scoring most Test centuries (34) and making the highest number of runs (10.122). did not cite any reasons for his refusal in a letter to MCC. but his friends believe he wanted to make a stand against what he regards as the insulting and humiliating behaviour of some of the MCC stewards on duty at the Grace Gate

Stark, whose daring and exhilarating cross country round on Murphy Himself has been a talking point of these championships - produced another superb, if hair-raising clear round, to add the world championship individual silver medal to his Olympic individual silver medal and to restore to Britain some muchneeded glory. Mrs Leng, who had seen her chances of retaining the world title collapse with a fall at the bullfinch fence on the cross country, went some way to atoning for this by producing one of only four clear rounds within the time in yesterday's show jumping. Typically she blamed herself for Saturday. It was a riposte of such indomitable spirit that it quite took the breath away, never more so than during a sensational innings by the captain, Mohammed Azharuddin. He has had egg on his face ever since he invited England to bat first, but by Saturday evening he was covered in something more glorious, having struck an 88-ball hundred containing some of the most exquisite strokes this great old ground has seen.

His 333 still, inevitably, dominated conversation on Saturday morning as the oncea year friends met up in that uniquely Lord's Test way. There was much wide eyed wonderment not least in the press box, where Boycott and Brearley, Gooch's opening partners of earlier vistage, miners of earner viniage, mineratedly discussed the hisory-making and its maker.

For a time, it seemed that the third day might belong to Gooch just as much as the first two had done. England made the early breakthrough they needed and then, when Goods overcame his deep disregard for his own bowling, his third ball dismissed the dangerous Manjrekar. Lewis, meanwhile, was delivering an outstanding spell from the pavilion end, fast and skilful. Time after time, he moved the ball away He was close to being to beat the outside edge. India were existing precariously but you would not have known it.

Shades of the great Ranji reappear to grace Lord's

ON Thursday and Friday, in old sticks. Some said the same the first Test match against India at Lord's, we saw much that is best in the English way of batting. On Saturday the Indians showed us something less calculating but unquestionably more beautiful.

Mohammed Azharuddin's unbeaten hundred, like Gooch's monumental innings, will be unforgettable to those who watched it. C. B. Fry believed the Indians to be the best natural batsmen in the world. The West Indians had yet to make their mark when he said that, and India and Pakistan still lived under the same roof. Coming from the sub-conti-nent the Indians have lightning quick eyes, wrists of steel and the dash of a Jodhpur

England's bowlers had been warned in the one-day internationals what to expect in conditions favourable to India's batsmen. Before that the New Zealanders were full of the way the Indians had made their runs when visiting them earlier this year. They had lost, but with a rare flourish. "Cest magnifique, mais ce n'est pas la guerre," said the ln England, too, we have some of Azharuddin on Saturday Azharuddin's idea of bliss must be to bet against England. As a 21-year-old against

David Gower's side in 1984-85 he made a hundred in each of his first three Tests - in Calcutta, Madras and Kanpur. He played then with an innocence and a charm and a touch that one could only marvel at. But, as Fry would understand, India is full of such talent, only a tiny part of which is tapped. At Lord's on Saturday, I imagine we must have seen from Azharuddin how Dulcepsinhji played there when making 173 for England against Australia in 1930 or his uncle, the great Ranji, when he made 154 against them at Old Trafford in 1896.

It is no good expecting Englishmen to bat like it. You might as well ask a greyhound to retrieve a pheasant or a labrader to win the greyhound derby. One of the beauties of cricket is how it lends itself to such diverse renderings. Saturday's play was an affirmation that in India the art of batsmanship is alive and well.
